The Winds Change

ALL THE VIRGINIA newswriters who commented on Governor Holton’s election, as well as those in Washington, New York and Time Magazine, pressed the efficacy of Candidate Holton’s “It’s time for a change” theme. What has never been made very clear is what Virginia is changing from and what it is hanging to. After reading all the pontifications on the subject, my own feeling is that the state is changing labels in the Governor’s office.

For years now Virginia’s governors and many of its representatives in Washington have been undistinguishable except in name from the typical Republican whose political philosophy lay between the extremes of Reagan and Rockefeller—or of Lindsay who, in a sort of reverse way, was Republican in name only. Going back to 1928, Virginia showed itself capable of voting Republican in a national election, and in recent years it was, to all intents, a Republican state in national elections. When in the gubernatorial election, the voters decided to take his name as well as the de facto practice, the real change was in abandoning allegiance to a myth—the myth that this was a Democratic state.

This myth had been enhanced by the long reign of the State Democratic Organization as controlled by the group known as “the Byrd Organization”—or, to Northern writers, the Byrd machine. For the three plus decades from 1926 to round the end of the 1950’s, the Byrd Organization, in controlling the State Democratic Party, reflected the interests of the majority of Virginians. That senator Byrd grew personally antithetical to Roosevelt’s policies, and then to Truman’s, did not bother Virginians in their Democratic identification, since it could be argued that Roosevelt and not Virginia’s representatives had deviated from the traditional Democratic principles.

But Roosevelt happened a long time ago, and that great majority of citizens under thirty today have no memory either of President Roosevelt or of what the Democratic Party was before he remodelled it. As the new generations reached voting age, Senator Byrd had become old and ill, and some of his basic philosophies seemed to them to have survived from some historic age. Then, as was frequently complained of, the Organization brought along no enlightened younger leaders to succeed the generation of leaders who, with Senator Byrd, were becoming old men. Finally, as it has been repeatedly pointed out of late, the old county “court house gangs”—which had formed the bulk of the Byrd Organization—no longer truly reflected a Virginia that had changed into an urban state.

The court house political units were composed of honest men who served their communities’ interests according to their lights; but all too frequently they were parochial minded, of limited vision, and did the human thing of resisting the political changes implicitly demanded by the changes in the state’s physical and economic structure. They had been in power as long as memory served; they were units in the Democratic organization and Virginia would always be a Democratic state. Indeed, they were of the essence of Virginia’s mystique about the land, going back across the centuries to legends of plantations and to Jefferson’s faith in the self-reliant farmers. For the myth about (Continued on Page 127)

Oath of Virginia’s First Governor
Under The Constitution

"I, Patrick Henry, elected Governor of Virginia by the representatives thereof, do solemnly promise and swear, that I will, to the best of my skill and judgment, execute the said office diligently and faithfully, according to law, without favour, affection, or partiality; that I will, to the utmost of my power, support, maintain, and defend the Commonwealth of Virginia and the Constitution of the same, and protect the people thereof in the secure enjoyment of their rights, franchises and privileges; and will constantly endeavor that the laws and ordinances of the Commonwealth be duly observed, and that law and justice, in mercy, be executed in all judgments.

And lastly, I do solemnly promise and swear, that I will peaceably and quietly resign the government to which I have been elected at the several periods to which my continuance in the said office is or shall be limited by law and the Constitution. So help me God."
IT WAS THE day of 1969's biggest football game for Wise County's Powell Valley High School near where Linwood Holton had gone to school. The sign practically shrieked:

The Mets Can
The Jets Can
Holton Can
Powell Valley Can

Powell Valley didn't. The team was defeated by arch-rival Appalachia High School 32-22. But the sign reflected a pervasive notion. Even in Holton's hometown of Big Stone Gap, his winning the governorship of Virginia was considered an upset.

There were signs that Holton himself, despite a towering self-confidence and a winner's ebullience, came late to the realization that he might really walk one day through the door of the governor's mansion of Virginia. No Republican governor ever had before. References to the miracles of the Jets and the Mets and even of man on the moon were common morale boosters in the flamboyant Holton Campaign Headquarters in Richmond. Even after the election was safely won and Gov.-elect Holton was on his way to his first visit with Mills E. Godwin, the man he was to succeed, Holton faltered in the State Capitol and had to ask directions to the governor's office.

To some it seemed as though the first time Linwood Holton ever believed from inside out that he was destined to be governor occurred in a flash one glorious starlit evening in the Roanoke Valley on the stage of a civic center auditorium in Salem.

That was the October night that Richard M. Nixon, beaming and romping with an infectious exuberance, bawled to a crowd of more than 6,500 cheering friends and neighbors of Holton:

"I will be proud to work as President of the United States with Lin Holton, the next governor of Virginia."

Holton knew then that it was so. The knowledge showed in his shining eyes, in his broad and for-once-uncontrolled grin, in the coil springs that sprouted from his dancing feet.

Have no doubts about it. Holton wanted to be governor. He wanted it so anxiously that one more in his string of sportsmanlike—but sometimes agonizingly... close—defeats might well have crushed him. But after that glorious night of adulation and honor, the coming win seemed sure and almost anticlimactic.

The new governor of Virginia is a good-sized man with the craggy features and physique of his mountain birthplace. He's good looking, even in the eyes of other men, and—but for a certain thin-lipped tightness about the mouth—might be called very handsome. He is an uncertain dresser, but he wears clothes well. He has the lope of a mountain boy, the authoritative bearing of a cultivated man, the fidgety gestures of controlled tension. You could say he looks like what he is: A highly successful Harvard-trained lawyer from Big Stone Gap, Virginia.

Holton launched himself from a comfortable back-country boyhood in Big Stone Gap. He attended Washington and Lee University, took a break for the World War II Navy, and got his law degree on the G.I. Bill at Harvard. He set up his law practice at Roanoke and built it into a thriving source of satisfaction. He married the daughter of Roanoke's most prominent lawyer, the scion of a patrician Virginia family, and fathered four bright, attractive children. He's come by that self-confidence honestly.

Almost as soon as young Linwood Holton had hung his plaque and published his business card in Roanoke, he was mixing in Republican affairs there. The “mixing in” quickly became a hassle and resulted in a party reorganization that eventually turned the Roanoke Valley into a Republican nest. Party building became Holton's political style. The party he built sent him to Richmond.

Linwood Holton was a new young lawyer in 1950, fresh out of Harvard Law School. He had a southern background, a legal wit, and a political ambition. For differing reasons Maine and Virginia beckoned. He chose Virginia and the railroad town of Roanoke, population 92,000, on the Roanoke River nestled between the Allegheny and the Blue Ridge Mountains. It reveals something about Holton's clear-headed pragmatism that he tells friends frankly, "If I had gone to Maine, I'd be a Democrat."

In Virginia, there were political opportunities for a Republican, if he didn't mind the underdog role. And Roanoke was the nearest city to Holton's hometown that was big enough for a political base.

To a less determined man—Holton has been known since childhood for his determination—the Virginia opportunities might have seemed in 1950 mighty slim for a Republican hopeful. There had never been a clearcut Republican governor.

Now that Holton is governor, there's a valid historical argument over whether he is the first ever. Gilbert C. Walker, governor from 1870 to 1874, and the first governor after post-bellum Virginia returned to the Union, might have claimed the distinction. But his Conservative Republicanism emphasized the Conservative, not the Republican. William E. Cameron, governor from 1882 to 1886, flirted with being a Republican briefly while in the statehouse. But he soon became disenchanted with what then was called Republican Mahoneism. He quickly turned to the Democrats.

The party of ascendancy when Walker was approaching the governor's race was the Conservative Party. It was the party of the "stable" people of Virginia and had the support of Whigs, Confederate Democrats, moderate Republicans and a few Negroes. It also had the support of President Grant.

The Conservative Party was suspicious of social programs like expanded public schools, tax reform, and untrammeled Negro suffrage. These were the stock of demagogues, radicals, and the Virginia Republican Party.

Walker won the governorship while the Conservatives won the General Assembly. The opposition was the Republicans. Thus, Walker obviously wasn't one.

Cameron's claim to Republicanism was equally tenuous. He was the candidate of U.S. Senator William Mahone of Norfolk, an Independent who voted with the Republicans in Washington. So important was Mahone's swing vote on Capitol Hill that President Chester A. Arthur gave him control over federal patronage in Virginia. It was patronage, administered by an Independent, that levered Cameron into office.

Mahone was such a political tyrant, however, that his excesses alienated not only the voting public but Cameron as well. The Conservative Party, united and rejuvenated by the ogre of Republican Mahonism, became the Democratic Party of Virginia at the Lynchburg Convention of 1883. Cameron had won the governorship as a Mahone Readjuster. He eventually became a Democrat.

The Republicans hung on for awhile as a force in state politics, but by the turn of the century had ceased to be a real threat to any Democrat nominated for the governorship. After Harry F. Byrd Sr. became governor in 1926 and the Byrd Organization took shape, it seemed as though man would reach the moon before a Republican became governor of Virginia. Man did, but barely.

When lawyer Holton set up shop in Roanoke, the city had a Republican Committee that existed largely on paper. It never nominated candidates. According to one account, when Holton went to his first Republican “mass” meeting he found six tired old men around a table.

Holton led a fight in 1952 to kick out the deadwood on the Republican Committee and he became chairman. That was the year also that Richard H. Poff broke the Democratic grip on Roanoke and the 6th Congressional District and went to Congress, to which he's been reelected ever since.

The Republican fight brought Holton notoriety in Roanoke. Noise of the party brawl even reverberated up in Washington, D.C. where a Roanoke girl named Virginia (Jinks) Rogers was living and working for the CIA. "My family kept sending me newspaper clippings about Linwood. We were all a little embarrassed by it. In my family, it wasn't considered quite nice to get your name in the paper," she recalled recently. She has had her own name in the paper almost continually since. She married Holton that year.

Party-builder Holton kept on boring in. "Those days," he has said, "Republican wasn't quite a dirty word, but it wasn't quite acceptable either." Dwight Eisenhower's Roanoke campaign had to be run by Citizens for Eisenhower. Ike swept the city, but there was hardly a Republican in sight. The next year, Republican Ted Dalton carried Roanoke in his gubernatorial bid.

According to Roanoke Times political writer Melville Carico, one of Virginia journalism's wise men, "Part of the GOP building program was running candidates for offices, knowing they didn't have a chance to win." In 1955, Holton came forward as the first Republican in anyone's memory to run for the House of Delegates from Roanoke. Out of 15,000 votes cast, he missed by 340. It was considered a triumph. In 1957, when he announced his candidacy, he thought, "Boy, this is it." Then, just before the election, Ike sent troops into Little Rock—and killed Holton as a General Assembly candidate.

In 1965, when Holton ran for governor, he polled the largest number of votes ever cast for a Republican state candidate in Virginia. It wasn't enough to put him in the statehouse then, but it was...

It's not how much you can leave them that worries us.
It's how much they can hold on to.

enough to deny Democrat Mills E. Godwin a majority.

In between 1957 and 1965, Holton made the decision—either fortuitously or shrewdly—that made him governor. He decided to throw in his lot with another loser, a black-haired, ski-nosed political pro named Richard Milhous Nixon.

Holton met Nixon in 1960. It wasn't an auspicious first meeting. Holton was a delegate to the Chicago convention and Nixon met with the Virginia delegation. Each delegate stepped up to an X on the floor, grabbed Nixon's hand, turned toward a fast camera, smiled, and was pushed on. Later in the year, Nixon came to Roanoke to campaign for president. Holton was one of those who made the arrangements. Four years ago, Nixon came to Virginia to campaign for Holton. The reception he got is credited with helping him to decide he could make a comeback.

Now Holton was on the rise—as long as Nixon was. Nixon placed Holton in 1968 on a six-man committee to handle the Nixon campaign for the Republican nomination at the Miami Beach Convention. Later Holton was a regional coordinator for Nixon's winning presidential campaign.

Remember the big day of that convention? The national press had headlines reporting that Rockefeller and Reagan were squeezing Nixon from the left and right. Well, that morning, Holton and Rogers C. B. Morton, two of Nixon's key men, were casually playing tennis at a private club with Charles McDowell and Jim Latimer of the Richmond Times-Dispatch, two more of Virginia's journalistic wise men. The Nixon operators had it figured, and they weren't worried.

Holton took the same kind of cool calculation into his own 1969 gubernatorial campaign. Nineteen sixty-nine was the year he got serious. With the help of his old friend, Richard Nixon, he won. Big. All over the state.

He may have first gotten serious about the governor's race in 1969, but Lin Holton got serious about politics the first time when he was 12 years old. The candidate then was a Big Stone Gap lawyer named Lewis McCormack, running for town council. Young Holton worked hard for him. McCormack lost. But even in losing, he helped shape the man Holton has become. Holton's father was a railroadman, but Holton early became interested in the law. He spent afternoons after school in McCormack's office reading transcripts of trials. "I used to go up there instead of movies," Holton has said.

"He was always rather serious," his mother remembers. "Most of his friends were older than he was. He was a little precocious."

Holton was christened Abner Linwood Holton Jr. Abner is a Hebrew name. It means, "My Father is light." Linwood is an Anglo-Saxon name with several possible derivations. Nobody in the Holton family ever used the A. Holton's father signed his name A. L. and was called Al. Holton tried A. Linwood for awhile but several years ago dropped the A. for simplicity. Holton's son, Abner Linwood III, 10, is called Woody.

Holton's father, who died last year, completed fourth grade ("That's all they offered in the plantation schools," Holton's mother says) and later attended Sullivan and Creighton Business College in Atlanta. He started in railroad work with the Southern Railway in Norfolk. Eventually, he shifted to the Interstate Railroad, a small, coal-hauling line, and rose to be its president. It was a prestigious position in Big Stone Gap but not enriching. "We always had what we wanted, but nothing to splurge," Holton's mother said.

Big Stone Gap was idyllic, even during Holton's depression years boyhood. WPA programs paved the streets, but cows still wandered in them. Young Lin earned money the only way he could find, raising brooders full of chicks bought when then were day old. He raised them to 2½ pound broiler size and sold them for 10 cents a pound. For an extra 10 cents, he’d dress the chicken.

Linwood’s father was a gardener and a hunter and Linwood took to the outdoors too. “One of my early memories is Dad coming home with game,” he said. Holton is still the gardener in his family, maintaining the landscaping at the Holton home in prosperous South Roanoke, and growing vegetables for the family’s consumption.

Lin was a successful student at Big Stone Gap High School, where he made good grades and participated in sports and extracurricular activities. The school is gone now, replaced by nearby Powell Valley High School.

In the 1942 Big Stone Gap High School yearbook, each of the seniors is summed up by a catchword. Some were called cute or sweet, manly or athletic. Linwood was called “efficient.” He was tapped as secretary-treasurer of the senior class and business manager of the yearbook, the School Bell. But Lin was no drudge. He went out for football and track. In his senior year he was on the two-man debating team that won the state championship for schools in Big Stone Gap’s size class. The resolution that year was, “Resolved, that the powers of the federal government should be increased.” Holton won with the affirmative. “I see no connection between that and my present philosophy,” he hastened to say recently, unnecessarily.

Natural contentiousness may have made him a debater or debating may have made him contentious. In any case, Holton’s American government teacher at Big Stone Gap, now Augusta County School Superintendent Hugh Kent Cassell, remembers Lin as a boy who “liked to raise questions in class and argue about the answers.” Cassell said, “He’d always come into the room talking with somebody, and he’d ask some mighty thought-provoking questions during class.”

A Washington and Lee instructor who never taught Holton but used to see him occasionally said much the same. “I believe he was the most cantankerous dang student there,” the instructor said. “But he was more fun to argue with than anyone else around.”

Contentious, serious, efficient, determined—these are qualities that the Holton family of Big Stone Gap instilled in its offspring. Linwood’s brother, Van, went to Georgia Tech and is now transportation planning manager for the Norfolk & Western Railway. His sister, Harriet, now a housewife, attended Randolph-Macon College and became a highly-regarded school teacher. Holton’s school choices of Washington and Lee and Harvard were not so much calculated as instinctive. “I dunno,” he said. “I guess Dad and I always figured here’s the best so why not do that.”

Determination is probably the word for whatever quality Holton brought to his courtship of Jinks Rogers. He was introduced to her one day on the street in Roanoke and was captivated by her smile. A year later, remembering the smile, he leaped at a chance to attend a Christmas party he heard she was also to attend. When he sought her out at the party, he found she didn’t remember him at all. Undaunted, Holton set up a commuter run to Washington where she was working. In a year, they were engaged; a few months later they were married.

There’s also a playful side to Holton, but it’s not usually trotted out in public.

Sometimes, even the playful side, has its overtones of determination. Take the Holton tennis

Virginia Rogers Holton

By Anne Smith
ROANOKE hairdresser, putting the finishing touches on a coiffure for Mrs. Linwood "Jinks" Holton, was discussing the economic effects that the state gubernatorial campaign was having on her business.

"There are already two people waiting in line to take your regular appointment as soon as you move to Richmond," she told her client.

The disclosure gave the wife of the Republican candidate a boost of confidence as she hit the campaign trail last spring.

"No matter how rough it gets, I know Lin has those two votes locked up," she quipped.

By early evening on November 5, it became apparent that 45-year-old Linwood Holton's support stretched far beyond the beauty shop set.

But as results filtered into the noisy, crowded suite at the Hotel John Marshall in Richmond, Jinks was scarcely aware of her husband's approaching victory.

"It was a thoroughly confusing evening," she recalled. "I was so worried about our son."

Earlier that day, 10-year-old Linwood "Woody" Holton III had suffered a nasty gash on his head when he tumbled from a bike while riding with his father's aides.

His worried mother spent election night applying ice packs to the wound and trying to soothe the pain.

It wasn't until the next morning that she realized fully that her family's destination was Capital Square.

That was when her red-haired, green-eyed husband awoke and announced:

"I'd rather be Governor of Virginia than President of the United States."

If Jinks had stuck with the Harry-Byrd-will-take-care-of-everything philosophy on which she was raised, it is unlikely that she would have awakened November 5 to be whisked off to the White House for lunch or confronted with queries from fashion reporters who asked:

"What are you planning to wear to the Inauguration Ball?"

To that question, she still had no answer, at the time of this interview.

"I'm considering several things," she said. "The one I like best so far is pale yellow, soft-flowing and beaded."

But she's exercising a woman's prerogative to change her mind if she sees something she likes better between now and January 17.

Jinks turned thumbs down on offers from several top American fashion designers who asked if they could create "something special" for her to wear to the ball.

"How can they design something special for somebody they never even met," she asked?

The 43-year-old future First Lady grew up with such confidence in the state's Democratic leadership that she never bothered to vote until 1952 when it was pointed out that perhaps there was one thing Harry Byrd couldn't manage—the election of Republican presidential candidate Dwight Eisenhower.

She joined the flock of Byrdite Democrats who swarmed to the ranks of Republicans. Linwood Holton was already there committed to the goal of building a two-party system in the Old Dominion.

Holton was the third Republican that Jinks, the former Virginia Rogers, had ever known when they met on a blind date in 1951.

Ted Dalton and a man named "X" Parsons were the others, she said. They used to hunt with her father, Roanoke attorney Frank Rogers, a man she described as (Continued on page 117)
Too bad. But it occurred to us that some of you might prefer insurance premiums that weren't based on predictions of what the economy will be 20 or 30 years from now. So we invented Econo-Flex. It's a new executive whole life plan ($25,000 minimum protection). Here's how it works. The premium payments vary according to the prevailing interest rate on long-term, taxable, U.S. Government bonds. Every three years the interest rate is reviewed, and so is your premium. As the interest rates go up, your premium rate goes down. Of course, it works both ways. This seems more realistic than today's typical plans with fixed premiums based on long-range economic projections, graphs, predictions or even a resident wizard. This new concept in life insurance is available only from Life of Virginia.
WHEN a young man is chosen for a high place in government—a place generally reserved for the seniors in politics—it is an indication that the voters consider him an exception to the ordinary rules. But, then, Sergeant Reynolds is no ordinary young man. Elected last fall as the state's new lieutenant governor, the 33-year-old Reynolds offered to the Virginia electorate what it probably expected and wanted—a fresh, new approach to the state's political current. Compared to the outdated, broken-down, unrepairable machine politics of Virginia's yesterday, the Reynolds campaign oratory resembled a sleek Rolls Royce: modern conveniences with traditional lines.

Shortly after Reynolds had been elected lieutenant governor, one Reynolds aide was asked to comment on his experience in the victorious campaign. "The sales promotion is easy when the product is a winner," was his reply. The answer was not unusual. No one on the Reynolds staff considered campaign duties to be work. Their part was a fortunate circumstance. To them, Reynolds was not the best choice, but the only choice. Anyone who thought otherwise just did not have the facts.

Yet, few modern political characters in Virginia have been the subject of discussion more than Reynolds. While there seems to be no limit to the admiration and attachment of his supporters, there is no measure to the detraction and small talk to which his opponents seem to resort. His enemies denounce him as a rich, pleasure-seeking opportunist, yet his friends unhesitatingly consider him a leader of the leaders, an energetic disciple of progressive politics, and an educated thinker and producer.

Above all, Reynolds has been criticized by his adversaries for his youthfulness. But, this is not necessarily because of his age. Jealousy has prevailed among those who govern because this independent politician did not graduate through the ranks of Virginia's traditional machine politics.

Virginia's machine rule politics had already begun when Julian Sargeant Reynolds was born in 1936. His father, Richard S. Reynolds, Jr., had a brokerage firm in New York City at the time. In 1938, his father left the firm to join Reynolds Metals Company in Richmond, and Sargeant became a Virginian.

Reynolds attended Woodberry Forest School in Orange County. Sam Fray, his teacher and football coach at Woodberry, recalls, "You didn't have to arouse Sarge's interest. He was easy to teach, he set high goals for himself and he worked hard to achieve those goals." Reynolds was head of the student government his senior year at Woodberry, but he did not campaign for the position. According to Fray, "He won because of his strong leadership qualities."

After Woodberry, Reynolds entered Princeton University. From Princeton he went to the Wharton School of Finance at the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated ninth in a class of 450. He then returned to Richmond to join his father at Reynolds Metals.

Reynolds' first participation in politics was highly rewarding to him. In 1965, as a candidate for one of the eight House of Delegates seats for Richmond and Henrico County, he ran first among 17 candidates while receiving 32,000 votes. He was 29 at the time, and he had recognized early his political drawbacks: youth, inexperience, money and family name. He overcame the obstacles by exhibiting a strong desire to serve in politics, as well as an exceptional speaking ability.

Three years as an instructor of Economics at the University of Richmond had given Reynolds the experience and assurance he needed to face campaign crowds. When speaking, his ingenuity, reasoning and imagination were matched only by his wit. That humor would undoubtedly help him in future campaigns.

The 1966 session of the General Assembly was Reynolds' first in the Statehouse. The proposed sales tax was the main issue of the session, and Reynolds spoke out against that part of the tax on food and prescription drugs. When the measure was up for final vote, however, he supported the tax—despite the levy on food and drugs—explaining, "Without the revenue from the sales tax we cannot make the progress in education that is so badly needed."

During the same session he sponsored the first legislation to provide tuition payments for police officers who desired to further their law enforcement education. He received a special award from the Virginia Fraternal Order of Police in recognition of that effort. In addition, he sponsored legislation allowing youths, whose parents or guardians received welfare aid, to earn money through part-time employment. Until 1966, anyone 21 years of age or older—whose family received welfare aid—was forced to remit to the state all income earned, and Reynolds claimed that this practice was spoiling the incentive to work.

In 1967, Reynolds was a candidate for one of Richmond's two...
NEWPORT NEWS. WE'VE LAUNCHED MORE THAN 500 SHIPS.

But wait 'till you see our encore. When we started out in 1886, we were just a small ship repair yard. We named the company Newport News. Because we were proud to be doing business here.

Today we're the largest shipyard in the world. And we're still proud to call ourselves Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company. Because a lot of the people who helped put us where we are today come from right here on the Virginia Peninsula.

With their help, Newport News has become an important asset to our community, our state and our nation.

Sure, launching over 500 ships in a little more than 80 years is a pretty impressive achievement. But we're not standing still for that. We're constantly looking to the future.

Today a major component of Tenneco Inc., the shipyard retains its identity and its unexcelled reputation for fine ships.

SINCE 1584, every generation of the Miller family has produced a Presbyterian minister. If Col. and Mrs. Francis Pickens Miller hadn’t had two sons, then the chances are that Andrew Pickens Miller might be leading a Presbyterian congregation instead of heading the state’s law firm, as he calls the attorney general’s office.

But his brother, Bob (the Rev. Robert Day Miller, now of St. Petersburg, Fla.), born 18 months after Andy, chose to continue the family tradition and Andy went into law.

“Law and politics have always been the two fields that were most fascinating to me,” Miller explains, “and the attorney general’s office represents a melding of the two.”

Then he laughed, and added, “You might say it was predestination.”

He recalls visiting Richmond as a small boy during the General Assembly sessions from 1936 to 1940 when his father was a delegate from then-rural Fairfax County. From the vantage point of a very small boy (Miller was born Dec. 21, 1932), especially one growing up on a 100-acre farm, it seemed, he recalls, “a very large place filled with all sorts of important people, holding very important offices.”

Now he’s returning, at a youthful 37, to occupy one of those important offices himself. In his first bid for public office, he outdistanced three other Democratic aspirants in the Primary, handily won over second place contender Guy Farley in a runoff, then turned back a strong challenge from Republican Richard D. Obenshain.

The road that brought him back to Richmond wound far afield.

His family moved from Fairfax to Charlottesville in 1947. His father, a retired Army colonel, served in both World Wars, and his mother, a writer, was at the time American editor for The London Economist.

In 1949, Col. Miller ran for the Democratic nomination for governor. There were three other candidates, but his principal opponent was John S. Battle, a candidate backed by the Byrd Organization. Young Andrew got his first taste of campaigning that year. He was 16 and traveled with his father, often helping drive him around the state. Another young man, William C. Battle, was driving his father. Battle, of course, won that year, and 20 years later, Andy Miller and Bill Battle, both having won hard-fought primaries and runoffs, found themselves together on the Democratic slate. This time, Miller won and Battle lost.

(Another spinoff of that race, manifest this year, was State Sen. Henry E. Howell Jr.'s bid for the Democratic nomination for governor. Howell credits Col. Miller's 1949 campaign with getting him—somewhat reluctantly—invol ved in politics.)

Miller shakes his head slightly as he recalls 1949. "The atmosphere of the state has changed so much in the last 20 years," he said recently. "I don't think people can understand what the psychological climate was here just after World War II.

"If one didn't go with the powers that were, then the machinery of the Democratic Party turned against you and you were out of the fold. My father was invited to become a member of the Organization, but he declined the honor, and his course was set."

The old line Democrats considered Col. Miller too much of a radical. "That's amusing," Miller said, "when you consider the things he was talking about have long become an accepted part of the Virginia scheme."

Two of his father's greatest objectives—improvement in the state's educational offerings and broader participation in government by the citizens—have at least been partially realized, he noted.

"He was trying to get people to develop a critical and constructive attitude toward politics at the state level. I don't recall the statistics, but the percentage of people actually voting then was incredibly small. One of his basic concerns was lack of critical analysis of state government. He had the feeling that politics in Virginia was an arena where only a few people participated and those not given seats in the arena had no voice in the decisions that were made. He felt state government would be more responsive if more of its citizens participated." Col. Miller particularly opposed the poll tax, since discarded as a prerequisite for voting.

Miller noted that, as a result of the 1949 Primary, a $75-million surplus was discovered about two weeks before the election, and substantial school construction came out of that so although his father didn't win, he helped give Virginia a push in the right direction.

"I can remember being subjected to a certain amount of abuse because of my father," he recalls. "It's always hard to understand why anyone should be against your parents." He thinks

At CNB you have more than a bank, you have a banker.

Choosing a bank is like choosing a partner. You want someone who is going to do his part in helping your company grow. You want to know you have a man you can depend on in good times and bad.

At CNB, businesses, large and small, have found the answer. CNB helped them get started, provided funds for inventory, new equipment and expansion. CNB, through the years, has always made it a policy to have funds readily available to its customers in the face of tight money conditions.

It is also a comfort to know that your banker at CNB is backed up by a professional capability which includes a modern data center which can often be called upon to provide information quickly and accurately. And finally, CNB's 12 convenient locations in Richmond make daily deposits and payrolls a simple matter.

At CNB you have more than a bank, you have a banker.
If you ever need someone to schedule the busy social calendar of a politician, plan a wedding and European honeymoon right in the middle of the Christmas holiday, or arrange an endless list of civic duties while taking care of a house full of kids, then I recommend Mary Ballou Reynolds. As wife of J. Sargeant Reynolds, the state’s lieutenant governor-elect, she is not only experienced in each of these time consuming affairs, but all of them at the same time. Her hectic schedule could very well be the wildest in existence—with the exception of her husband’s. And, anyone visiting Mary Ballou the week before Christmas would even disregard the exception.

My visit was sandwiched in just after her husband’s successful campaign and their marriage and honeymoon, and just prior to their holiday festivities and his inauguration. I found the Reynolds’ large, white, two-story brick home near the end of Hampton Hills Lane in Richmond’s west end. “Come on up the hill beyond the ‘dead end’ sign” Mary Ballou had directed earlier on the telephone. Two large boxwoods, framing the front archway to the home, were filled with several dozen giant white Christmas lights. A small boxwood wreath, scattered with artificial fruit and looking very Christmasy, hung on the front door.

Inside, I found the hostess in the living room, tinkering with faulty Christmas tree lights. It was surprising, I thought, to find this attractive, petite, fashionable lady on her hands and knees working on the family Christmas tree. “This string of lights must be getting old,” she remarked with a smile and a greeting. I noticed that her casual, white and gray jumper complimented her blond, flipped hair. After a quick attempt to tighten the bulbs in the unlit string, she postponed the decorating and we moved out to a comfortable, window and book lined study.

At least three dozen Christmas cards were propped on book shelves behind the study couch, while another couple of dozen cards, along with their ripped envelopes, were scattered on several tables. I glanced through the cards while Mary Ballou slipped out for two glasses of freshly made eggnog. "I can tell you we don’t suffer from boredom around here," she said, returning from the kitchen. Then, with a yuletide cheer, we settled down for a chat.

As we sipped our eggnog, I attempted to piece together the biography of Mrs. J. Sargent Reynolds. Born July 12, 1937, in Lynchburg, Mary Ballou Handy was the second of three daughters of Dr. and Mrs. Stafford O. Handy. Her late father was a noted radiologist; her mother a busy housewife. Mrs. Handy moved to Richmond after her husband’s death in the late 1950's.

Mary Ballou attended Stuart Hall, a private boarding school in Staunton—her favorite studies included history and English; riding and tennis were her top extracurricular activities. An above average student, she graduated from Stuart Hall and entered Sweet Briar College. "I was really crazy about history," Mary Ballou recalled of her college days. "I majored in history; my minor was the history of art."

Our conversation was interrupted at this point for an egg nog refill, and our talk slipped back to the present. "So many things have been happening at once," she said. First, her husband-to-be’s campaign victory in November. Two weeks later they were married in Richmond and off on a two week honeymoon. Later, back home, it was time for Christmas shopping, and civic duties, and planning a reception for members of the General Assembly, and getting ready for Sargent’s inauguration.

Despite a busy schedule, Mary Ballou is surprisingly active in civic work in the Richmond area. She is a member of the Junior Board of the Crippled Children’s Hospital, and she spends many hours in reading and recreational therapy with the children. She is a former member of the Junior League. "One of our projects was testing public school children for hearing defects," she recalled of her work in the league. She has been active in the United Giver’s Fund and the James River Garden Club. When the garden club subject arose, Mary Ballou was eager to explain how she had made tiny, ornamental Christmas trees out of boxwood as part of the club’s annual holiday "green sale," and we then adjourned the talk to visit her floral workshop in her basement.

"First, I shape and soak the oasis base of the tree," she demonstrated. "Then, the boxwood is picked and stuck into the oasis. Fruit, berries, or even lemons or limes can be added for special effect." Passing through her dining room, on the way back to the study, I spotted one of the small trees being used as a dining table center-piece.

Like her husband, Mary Ballou enjoys almost all kinds of music, "from opera to pop to Burt Bacharach." Unlike her husband, she is not competition spirited when it comes to sports activities. "Sarge plays football and could watch a game on television all day," she said, "but I like the non-competitive, like riding. I try to ride a couple days each week—schedule permitting." She has her own horse, boarded with a friend in the country along with the ponies belonging to her twins, seven-year-old sons, Joey and Teddy. The twins, and three-year-old

OUR JOB is generating electricity and getting it to where it's used. We're in this business because it is concerned with the supply of a fundamental requirement of modern living, because it's an honorable one, because we like it and because we want to earn a living at it.

We aim to give one kind of service to everyone . . . the best that's possible. That means supplying our customers with what they want when they want it. It means being courteous at all times and maintaining attractive easy-to-do-business-with offices. It means doing everything we can to keep complaints from arising, and it means prompt and fair handling of those that do.

We are a citizen of each community we serve and take an active part in its affairs. Like any other citizen, we want our neighbors to think well of us. Besides, it makes good business-sense. We can only prosper as the community prospers so we help it to thrive in every way we can.

Such is our job as we see it. We are trying to do it well and to do it better all the time.

APPALACHIAN POWER CO.
EVERY woman has her own way of interpreting the "for better or for worse" clause of a marriage contract.

For Doris Miller, wife of state attorney general-elect Andrew P. Miller, it's less a question of what's better, or worse than it is what she can do to make everything turn out for the best.

Her prevailing philosophy is a simple one: to be what she is. What she is, on the other hand, is one of the most exacting professions in the world: a Wife.

She is also a mother, a Vassar graduate, an unaffected and disarming personality, a masterful political campaigner and a very witty lady to boot.

It all began in 1954 when she married Andrew Pickens Miller, who warned her then he wanted to enter politics.

At the time, she answered with a somewhat non-commital "of-course-you-are, dear."

Fifteen years and three children, later, however, she saw that forewarning blossom into one of the most hectic periods of her life.

She was more than up to it, thanks again to the ready wit, the composure and the unaffected style that so mark her personality.

Mr. Miller's successful campaign will be remembered in many areas of Virginia on the strength of his wife's efforts.

Her quips and comments to the people and press in all areas of the state will undoubtedly be remembered for quite a while.

A sampling:

"Last week I had to hitchhike into Lexington on Interstate 81. A nice couple from Texas gave me a ride. But I'm sure they didn't believe a word of what I said."

"I dreamed the other night that Andrew had been elected on Nov. 4—and then they declared another election for Christmas!"

"I drive a six-cylinder car (across Virginia to campaign) and it frequently dies. Everybody but me has worried about me, but I've had a marvelous time."

"I had always thought I would get a job. Now I have to get Andrew a job."

"My campaign promise is bicycles for the children."

"It's wonderful traveling over the state, but it was disconcerting with no radio in the car. It wasn't until we drove into a filling station that I learned the Mets had won the Series."

"I'd be working for Andrew P. Miller even if I weren't married to him."

"I haven't seen much of Andrew this summer, but I'm going to see him—somewhere—Thursday. It's our anniversary."

In an age when politics and political campaigning are slicker than ever, when every word should be a pearl of wisdom, the sparkling Mrs. Miller chose a different approach, and it worked.

Why it worked goes all the way back to Princeton, New Jersey.

Doris Brown was the second daughter of Dean and Mrs. J. Douglas Brown. Her father was dean of faculty and provost of Princeton University.

She was educated in the Princeton public school system and graduated from Vassar College in 1953 with an English major and philosophy and religion minor.

Following one year's work at McGraw-Hill Publishing Co. she married Mr. Miller and spent the next year at St. Anne's College, Oxford, England where she studied the metaphysical poets and Andrew studied politics, philosophy and economics.

The next few years were "Army years" for the couple, and Mrs. Miller traveled with her husband from Ft. Sill, Oklahoma to Tokyo, Japan where she worked in the Fulbright office while he served in Korea.

They returned to Ft. Campbell, Kentucky and then moved to Charlottesville where Andrew entered law school for three years.

Three other important events took place about that time: Julia Lane was born in 1958, Andrew Pickens Jr. in 1960 and Elise Givhan in 1963.

By the time Elise arrived, they had moved to Abingdon where they have lived since. Now, one more move is in store for the family: to Richmond.

With such an active and diversified past, and with her roots in the North, Mrs. Miller feels especially fortunate to be a Virginian now.

"I chose to be a Virginian," she says, and her busy life in Abingdon alone bears fine witness to her pleasure at being here.

She has been chairman of the Virginia Highlands Arts Festival-Literary Program for five years; has reviewed fiction for the Roanoke Times; has been a lay reader for Barter Theater under the Ford Foundation Program for several years; and has served on the board of the Bristol Concert Ballet Company and has been vice-president of the local American Field Service Chapter.

She lists her most important activity, however, as "being a mother," and her only claim to fame in being Andrew Miller's wife.

Social activities interest her second to her family's activities, and at this writing she is home in Abingdon with them preparing for the move to Richmond.

The draw she feels toward community and civic affairs is part of a prevailing philosophy she feels about life in general.

"People working together is the most important thing, not economic determinants or any of those other things. I'm a great believer in human beings."

And that, undoubtedly, is the single touchstone behind being a successful wife as well as a successful political campaigner.

EIGHT GOVERNORS
OF THE COMMONWEALTH
OF VIRGINIA
HARRY FLOOD BYRD

- Virginia's 56th governor, the late Harry Flood Byrd, retired from the United States Senate in November 1965, at the age of 78 after a distinguished political career which began in the state senate when he was 27.

Passionately engaged over his 30-odd years in the United States Senate in the battle for fiscal sanity and government conservatism, Byrd was long a significant national figure, as well as dominating the Virginia political scene.

Born in Martinsburg, West Virginia, Byrd was brought as a baby to Winchester, where he grew up. He left school at the age of 15 to assume successful management of his father's near-bankrupt newspaper, The Winchester Star.

At the age of 33, Byrd became chairman of the State Democratic Committee. While in New York at the Democratic National Convention, Bishop James Cannon, Jr., ordered him not to run for governor in Virginia, where "we have decided to elect Walter Mapp." An enraged Byrd took up the opposition and won decisively. Just before this event, he had been chosen to lead the state's "pay as you go" forces, then fighting a proposed $50 million bond issue, which was soundly defeated.

Byrd immediately started his administration with a sweeping reorganization of the state government, backed by sturdy approval from the General Assembly. This eliminated myriad departments and positions of commissioners, cutting costs by nearly half a million dollars annually. He thus began a tenure whose record of accomplishment remains unparalleled in post-Civil War Virginia.

Appointed by Governor John Garland Pollard to fill the Senatorial seat of Claude A. Swanson, appointed Roosevelt's Secretary of the Navy, this direct descendant of William Byrd of Westover entered upon the distinguished national career which closed with his retirement to his Berryville farm. His death in October 1966 was to many the end of an era. Byrd will be remembered not only as irritant, but as a powerful opponent, to national leaders advocating big government and big spending.
COLGATE W. DARDEN, JR.

The Commonwealth's 60th governor and, until his retirement in 1959, the University of Virginia's third president, Colgate W. Darden, Jr., is a man whose mental facility is broadly appreciated, a man whose advice and abilities are widely sought, a man who wears the mantle of modesty about his multiple skills and accomplishments. An energetic and handsome man, he embarked early on a long, uninterrupted career which reflects many interests and talents.

Later distinguished as an educator, he was a student in 1916 at the University when he enlisted in the French Army. Before prolonged exposure hospitalized him, he had seen action at Verdun, Champagne and in the Argonne, winning a citation for bravery. He came home, joined the Marines as a flier and was again hospitalized with serious injuries, when his plane crashed shortly before the Armistice.

Mr. Darden's first political venture came when, at the age of 31, he was elected to the House of Delegates and from there to Congress.

During Governor Darden's administration, Virginia's 100-year-old debt was retired. Also, under his leadership, moves were made to increase by $23 million the capital outlays and salaries for state institutions of higher learning.

Assessing what he would consider his greatest contribution as governor, Darden picked his penal reforms. Those reforms included introduction of probation and parole, establishment of a State Department of Corrections, and construction of facilities for first offenders.

For Darden, now living in Norfolk, education has remained a major interest. Only 16 months after his term as governor ended, he began his 12-year administration as president of the University of Virginia. He has been concerned since his own student days with advancing the state's schools.

In 1961, Mr. Darden headed the United Negro College Fund drive in the state.

In 1957, he was appointed by President Eisenhower to the board of consultants on Foreign Intelligence Activities and, in 1960, to the Commission on National Goals.
WILLIAM MUNFORD TUCK

William Munford Tuck—a genial, colorful and controversial Virginian—prefers to be, and is more usually, known as “Bill.”

From Halifax County, the 61st governor has never lost the common touch nor his taste for mountain music and Brunswick stew. He remains unimpressed by stuffed shirts and scornful of shirkers.

Unpretentious and spontaneously just the “country lawyer” he is, Bill Tuck favored the Washington arena with his dynamic, convivial nature; he was U.S. Congressman from Virginia’s Fifth District until 1968. His espousal of constitutional government and “sound doctrine” won him much ambivalence on the political front. But that his fame has crossed the state’s borders is attested to by a Florida county’s move, in 1956, to enter his name in the Democratic Presidential Preference Primary.

Winning election to Virginia’s House of Delegates in 1923, he became State Senator in 1931 and Lieutenant Governor of Virginia in 1941. Four years later he began as governor a tenure characterized both by spontaneous congeniality and serious determination.

During this term, salaries in public schools were upped by an average $600, operating funds for mental hospitals nearly doubled and several serious strikes were averted, with the General Assembly passing two significant labor laws: the state’s “Right to Work” law, a prototype for other states, and the Public Utilities Labor Relations Act, both of which have had far-reaching effects on Virginia’s economic stability. Perhaps because of the strong, warm ties with his tobacco farming friends in the South Boston area, farm to market roads underwent such betterment as literally to take farmers “out of the mud.”

Three years after Bill Tuck went home in 1950, he was chosen in a special April 14 election to succeed Congressman Thomas B. Stanley, who came home to run for governor. When asked why he was quitting that post he replied that he had “some rest time and some play time coming,” both of which are being done in typical “Bill” Tuck style.
JOHN STEWART BATTLE

North Carolina-born son of a Baptist minister, John Stewart Battle served as Virginia's sixty-second governor. His easy-going composure and slow speech fail to communicate the flavor of his active, useful life.

A strong and forceful leader, he once laconically summed up his 19 years in the General Assembly and the Executive Mansion by saying: "I just went down to Richmond and did what had to be done." Among the things that "had to be done," he feels his greatest accomplishments came in what he did for public education.

At the end of his tenure as governor, Battle returned to Charlottesville to resume his private law practice, but he remained a "favorite son" and was, as such, nominated for vice president at the 1956 Democratic National Convention, after he led the South's dramatic platform fight.

In 1955, he was appointed to the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations by President Eisenhower who also named him as an original member of the Commission on Civil Rights in 1958. In the same year he served as Virginia's representative to the Brussels World's Fair.

He was an active Virginia Democratic advocate for election of the Kennedy-Johnson ticket at the time his son, William Cullen Battle, was state campaign chairman.

Born in the summer of 1890, the Albemarle County lawyer entered politics at 27 when he ran for the post of Charlottesville's Commonwealth Attorney. This turned out to be the first and last electoral defeat of his career.

John Stewart Battle was elected to the House of Delegates in 1929 and again two years later. He declined to seek a third term, but his public was not to accept his retirement for, when Roosevelt appointed State Senator N. B. Early as U. S. Collector of Internal Revenue for Virginia, a convention—without consulting Battle—nominated him, and the people voted him in.

Now in Charlottesville, Battle, 79, keeps as busy as his health will allow. He looks back on his years as Governor of Virginia as the most challenging in a long life.

to tell the Virginia Story
THOMAS BAHNSON STANLEY

Thomas Bahnson Stanley is a 79-year-old Virginian who has apparently thrived on a life of hard work. Youngest of seven children, he was born on a small tobacco farm near Spencer. He went directly from high school into a coal mining job before enrolling in a New York business college.

At the age of 63, Stanley was Virginia's 63rd governor, his political career beginning when he won a seat in the House of Delegates in 1929. Later Speaker, in 1946 he succeeded Thomas Burch as Fifth District U. S. Representative in Congress, where he was known for his vigorous opposition to unnecessary spending and to socialized medicine legislation.

Governor Stanley was elected in one of the most exciting races of recent Virginia politics. In his campaigning, he found invaluable the guidance of his early Christian training and the stress on reaching the grass roots learned from his father who was Henry County's Commissioner of Revenue.

Always an active Methodist, Stanley has served his church in many capacities, among them as trustee of two church schools—Ferrum Junior College and Randolph-Macon College.

In 1960, he was made chairman of the State Hospital Board, an appointment which acknowledged his vigorous efforts to improve the standards of Virginia's mental hospitals.

After a seven-year stint in banking, Stanley entered the furniture business which was his major business affiliation. He was board chairman and treasurer of the Stanley Furniture Company, until its recent merger with the Mead Corporation. Currently he is a director of Stanley Land and Lumber Company and senior vice president and vice chairman of the board of the First National Bank of Bassett.

The former governor lives at Stoneleigh, his farm near Stanleytown, where he raises Herefords and Holsteins, still managing to find time for hunting and fishing in the midst of carrying a workout of civic and business activities that would shatter a man of half his age.
Sixty-fourth Governor of Virginia, James Lindsay Almond, Jr., served Virginia during a period of much turbulence, managing to stand firmly by his beliefs. This courage of his convictions did, however, cause him what he terms "the one regret" of his administration, that of breaking with Senator Byrd.

His railroad engineer father returned to his Orange County farm six years after his son's birth in 1898 in Charlottesville. There the future governor, who was to need his gift of oratory in the troubled years ahead, held the turkeys as captive audience while he practiced public speaking. And perhaps here lay the seeds of the future Attorney General's effectively staunch defense of the Constitution and his native state against the invasion of the Supreme Court's 1954 school desegregation decision.

A vigorous, white-haired and imposing figure, he was familiar with hard work, as his schooling was broken into with jobs of various sorts, including hard physical labor, before he finished law school and entered practice in Roanoke.

Following his uncle and grandfather into politics, he won appointment to the post of Roanoke's assistant Commonwealth's Attorney and was, at the age of 35, the youngest man to preside— as judge of Roanoke's Hustings Court—over a Virginia court of record.

After 13 years on the bench, in 1946 Almond agreed to run for Congress to fill the unexpired term of Clifton Woodrum. Waging three campaigns, he first won the special election, then the primary and was, finally, elected to a regular term. As a Congressman, he drafted phases of the Loyalty Bill of 1947, handled it for the Democrats and, fighting off devitalizing amendments, saw it through to passage by the House. This bitterly opposed fight was to typify much of his service. Familiarity with a tough fight, teamed with his emotional capacity to meet strong challenges, as well as his legal ability and administrative skill, served him in good stead when he became Virginia's Attorney General in 1948.

He is now serving as Associate Judge, United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals to which post he was appointed in 1962.
ALBERTIS SYDNEY HARRISON, JR.

History is certain to honor Albertis Sydney Harrison, Jr., as one of the ablest of Virginia's long line of distinguished Governors. It is a mark of the inherent modesty and dignity of the man, however, that this claim will have been established by deeds and not by words. Governor Harrison devoted his term to a quiet, effective campaign to guide Virginia to new heights in every area from higher education to industrial development.

Born in Brunswick County January 11, 1907 and educated in the county public schools and at the University of Virginia, Albertis Harrison began practicing law in Lawrenceville immediately after receiving his degree in 1928. Four years later he declared for the office of Commonwealth's Attorney for Brunswick and was elected.

Harrison was Brunswick Commonwealth's Attorney for 14 years, both before and after service in the Navy in World War II as judge advocate and defense counsel in general court martial. By 1947 he found too demanding the pressures of his private law practice and his duties as Commonwealth's Attorney, Lawrenceville town counsel, and counsel and board member of the Farmers and Merchants Bank of Lawrenceville. When a seat became open for the Seventh Senatorial District, Albertis Harrison filed for the office and was easily elected and fulfilled a longstanding desire to enter the legislative branch of state government.

In the Senate Harrison was a member of the steering committee and of the committees on finance, courts of justice, roads and internal navigation, public institutions and education, and counties, cities and towns. He also served on the Virginia Advisory Legislative Council.

Harrison was elected Attorney General of Virginia in 1957, resigning this position in 1961 to make the race for Governor.

Long a champion of quality education, Harrison made some of his greatest contributions in this area. Under his administration faculty salaries in the state institutions were boosted above the national level. The state's new vocational and technical colleges were instituted, six more two-year colleges were opened, and facilities at established colleges and universities were expanded.

The handsome, white-haired Harrison returned to Lawrenceville where he continued his law practice and the operation of his 1,600-acre tobacco, beef cattle and timber farm and indulged in a favorite pastime, golfing—at least for a time. He is now wearing a black robe as a Judge of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, a pinnacle in his chosen profession.
MILLS E. GODWIN, JR.

Progress has been the keynote of the administration of Mills E. Godwin, Jr., Virginia's 66th governor.

Born on his father's truck farm in Nansemond County, from a long line of farmers, he also had a political heritage. An ancestor was in the General Assembly of 1797 and his father's first cousin was Commonwealth's Attorney of Nansemond County for 25 years.

Godwin studied at the College of William and Mary and the Law School of the University of Virginia, where he received his degree in 1938. In addition to his law practice in his home county and his many civic activities, he has served there as Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney.

During the war years he served as a special agent for the F.B.I. and received two commendations by J. Edgar Hoover for outstanding service.

Godwin is an informal, friendly, warm, deeply religious person. He genuinely likes people from whom, in his opinion, "the realization of every hope and dream we have must ultimately flow."

Both his personal life and his experience at various levels of state government gave him the equipment to translate his practical solutions for Virginia's needs into political realities. During his 18 years in the General Assembly and as Lieutenant-Governor, a decade of which was spent as a state senator, he served as a member of the commissions on public education; as a member of the Virginia Advisory Legislative Council; on the Governor's Budget Advisory Committee; past chairman, Virginia Potomac River Commission; past vice-chairman, Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government. He was a member of the following Senate Committees: Finance; Courts of Justice; Welfare; Counties, Cities, and Towns; and Chairman of the Committee on Fish and Game.

Virginia's progress during the Godwin administration was not totally involved in any one area of need nor was it financed cheaply. Additional revenue was needed and a state sales tax was enacted. Although certain portions of this tax have been severely criticized, the things made possible by the additional revenue in the field of education alone cannot be overlooked. Schools, hospitals, correctional institutions, roads, cultural endeavors—all have felt the Godwin touch. There have been trade missions to Europe; the long talked of "local option" has become a reality; extensive building programs have provided space for expansion and more widespread and efficient services. The keynote has been progress—on the whole growth of the state and her people.

Godwin plans, as of this writing to return to Nansemond County—where he and Mrs. Godwin have a new home under construction—and to his law practice there. What his future will hold remains to be seen, but it is hard to believe that such a concerned man would close all political doors.
Reynolds Metals Company considered a number of important factors when it decided to move its corporate headquarters from New York to Virginia over 30 years ago.

Virginia, we recognized, was close to many of the great population centers. Virginia offered ocean ports to world markets, dependable rail service to any point in the country, and accessible highway transportation. Virginia also offered an attractive labor force. There were cultural advantages and recreational opportunities, excellent educational institutions, outstanding museums, pleasant living conditions, and a lesson in American history at every crossroad.

In 1938, when we moved our headquarters here, we had only one facility in Virginia - our Richmond South Plant. Today, in addition, we have our two headquarters buildings in Henrico County, a foil and container plant in Richmond, extrusion, printing and reclamation plants in Chesterfield County, and a plastics plant in Grottoes. Three of our research divisions are headquartered in Richmond, and we have two pilot plants and a packaging machinery workshop at Bellwood.

We are grateful for those distinctly Virginia conditions which have been responsible for decisions over the years to expand our Virginia operations.

Ridgeway brings you the correct time in six decorator colors, six beautiful woods and thirty-two classic designs.

Consider the superb examples of Virginia craftsmanship below and try to imagine a home they wouldn't enhance. Beautifully, Ridgeways come in styles to complement any decor and in sizes to fit any room. Or budget. (They start at $195.) Each contains an equally superb example of West German clocksmithery, including a choice of four mellifluous chimes. In short, a Ridgeway clock tells considerably more than the time. It tells what kind of person you are.

This is the latest thing in cheap, ugly metal buildings.

Ugly?

Not by a long shot. The new Landmark building system by Butler is practically the best of both possible worlds for shops, dealerships, offices. You get the freedom to choose any decorative fascia you want without sacrificing Butler's famous pre-engineering advantages.

You get faster construction, economical clear spans with clean interiors, a superior roof, earlier occupancy and a better investment return.

Landmark is just one of the New Generation of Buildings by Butler. Four interrelated building systems with your choice of seven walls and four outstanding roof systems.

Call us soon. As your Butler builders, we want to show you just how exciting these new Landmark designs can be. And the rest of the New Generation as well. We guarantee price, accept single-source responsibility.

There's one born every 16 seconds...
A new customer for paper

No, the Stork isn’t one of our stockholders, but he has an interest in our industry. For babies begin right away to use paper products. And by the time they grow up and become people, they’ll each be using at least 500 pounds every year. . . . Though a baby is born in the United States every 16 seconds, there will be enough wood as raw material to supply each with the tons of paper products he’ll demand during his lifetime. That is because the paper industry plants two or more trees for every one it consumes. Among the ten largest industries in the U. S., it’s a “growing” industry in more ways than one!

game, for instance. Tennis connoisseur McDowell once described Holton's tennis game as a kind of duel between Holton and the ball with the racquet serving as a club. Holton concedes the fairness of that assessment. He sums up his tennis game with what might be his political credo: "I see the ball and I go try to hit it." Holton adds, "But I'm gonna learn."

Holton wears green tinted contact lenses, not, he says for their cosmetic effect but because they give him keen vision and the green cuts glare. Still, the tint gives his eyes a striking green luminosity. Jinks Holton teases, "I'll see a blonde gazing up into his eyes at a cocktail party. 'What green eyes,' she'll say. He says, 'Thank you.' Then when he sees me, he says, 'It's the green tint of my contacts, you know.' But not till he realizes I'm listening."

There are few who think Holton's political success can be attributed to luck, but he has been known to favor a good luck charm or two. During the '69 campaign, Mrs. Margaret Byrd Stimpson, a former ambassador in Latin America, sent him an elephant hair bracelet from Kenya. "Wear it and you can't lose," she wrote. He wore it around his ear the first day he had it. Perhaps he could have lost, but he didn't; although the significance of the elephant hair bracelet may not have been so great as the significance of a friendly gesture to Republican Holton from a lady whose middle name was Byrd.

Also in the 1969 campaign, the Holton staff received a frantic query from Holton's sister, Harriet. "Linwood does have a Big Stone Gap buckeye, doesn't he?" she asked. He did. A buckeye is a horse chestnut and it's reputed in the mountain country to confer good luck. Holton's father carried one. Holton got his from Roland Rose of Wise County during an Oct. 18 campaign stop. He's still carrying it.

Holton can take his whisky or leave it alone. When he's taking it, he prefers top quality bourbon. During the 1965 campaign, he used to end each day with a highball made with Rebel Yell. He has since switched to Virginia Gentleman, a full-bodied 90 proof bourbon manufactured in Fairfax County. But during the '69 campaign, his only cocktail was V8 juice. "I picked that because I wanted something I could drink a whole lot of," he said. He told an aide that he calculated skipping the evening highball added an hour's worth of energy to his day.

Mrs. Holton didn't get the word until late in the campaign, apparently. She gave these tips to their nephew, Ted Vaden, in June when he joined the Holton staff: "Be on time. Keep your common sense. And always carry a bottle."

The no nonsense approach that Holton carried into his '69 general election race showed up to his associates early, however. It started when he assembled some of them into one of the most talented campaign staffs the state had seen. The starter was John Ritchie, personable young lawyer and former executive director of the voters' organization called Richmond Forward. Then Holton inquired among what have been called here "the journalistic wise men of Virginia" and was directed to Staige D. Blackford Jr., Norfolk political writer for The Virginian-Pilot. Blackford came highly recommended as a newsman of cultivation and impressive background who knew and was popular with the state's working political press. The coup may have been, however, when Holton lured up from Texas the young team of Marvin Collins and Carleton Suiter, specialists in running election campaigns.

They put together a hard-working squad that ran what Charles McDowell, who knows about such things, called "the best organized state political campaign that's ever been operated in Virginia."

The campaign had its high spots and its low ones.

One high spot came in Portsmouth during a TV confrontation between Holton and his opponent, William C. Battle. Holton proposed that a new, unified state ports authority acquire and run all Hampton Roads public port terminals. Battle derided the idea as prohibitively expensive and unworkable. In next day's Virginian-Pilot, Holton's proposal was a top local story. Beside it, coincidentally, was an account of remarks by venerable Democratic State Sen. Edward L. Breeden, chairman of a port study commission, putting forward what seemed from the press account virtually an identical concept.

Holton came bounding out of his motel room the next day, gleefully waving the newspaper. He bumped into Mel Carico.

"Mornin', Melville," he boomed. "Sometimes," he joshed, "it looks like the good Lord just wants me to be governor."

A low spot came in Richmond when both candidates spoke before the Astoria Beneficial Club. Holton was introduced by Negro Republican Clarence Townes, Battle by Negro lawyer Oliver Hill. Townes dwelled loudly on the Martinsville Seven, a bitter case of seven black rapists executed during the 1950-1954 gubernatorial term of candidate Battle’s father. It was indefensible as an issue in a 1969 campaign, but Holton sat silently, fidgeting with his fingernails and grimacing as he does under stress. “It made me sick,” he said later, “but I couldn’t think of just what to do.”

In general, the campaign between Battle and Holton remained on a higher plane, developed less personal acrimony, than had the Democratic primaries involving Battle, Norfolk State Sen. Henry E. Howell Jr., and Lt. Gov. Fred G. Pollard. On election night, when Bill Battle and his wife, Barry, came to Holton headquarters to congratulate the victor, Holton choked with emotion as he never had in defeat. “We’ll need your help,” he told Battle.

Holton, on the campaign trail, was a variable quantity. His facial expressions on TV were the despair of his staff. Sometimes the camera would pan in just as Holton had lowered his head like a charging bull, making horns of his rubber eyebrows. He would glare upward and twist his mouth into a grimace, momentary but startling. Onlooking staffers would groan. At other times, Holton would flash that grin and even onlookers from the Battle camp would be moved to smile sympathetically back.

Another concern of the Holton staff in the early stages of the general campaign was his lack of sartorial solicitude. His suits weren’t shabby exactly, but, well, say they reflected a certain casual unconcern. Staff director John Ritchie made appointments for Holton at Richmond clothiers Berry-Burk & Co. two days running. Finally, he dragged Holton in and supervised as the candidate discarded his brown suit and nothing tie and acquired three conservative blues, new shirts, ties, the works.

Holton’s concern was with issues, and he initiated most of the real debate of the campaign. There was the port matter for one. And he proposed a $9 sales tax rebate for every Virginian. Holton said he would appoint a businessman’s committee to study an economizing reorganization of the state government, a reorganization he said would save $50 million to $100 million a year. He was severely critical of the state’s mental health program and of the State Water Control Board. He outlined a plan of tax relief for the elderly.

Whatever the formula, whatever the mix of Presidential intervention, personal determination, organization, staff, issues, the good Lord, the result was clear. Holton, a Republican in "Democratic" Virginia won the governorship. The cavernous old home in Roanoke which the campaigner had neglected so long would have to wait another four years to claim its resident again.

The Holton family has lived since 1960 in a huge homey house built in 1925 with so many rooms that nobody was sure how many until Virginia Tayloe (called Tayloe), 13, counted them for a school project. “There are 18, Mother.”

The home is on shady Avenham Avenue and sits on a tree-guarded rise from which green lawn slopes away to an all-sides fence. A magnificent magnolia guards the front approach. You have to look closer to see that the master has been otherwise occupied in recent days: peeling paint on the front door, rusting red wheelbarrow in the shade of the magnolia tree, plaster cracking away from the living room ceiling.

But the race for the governorship has touched the home and the family in rewarding ways, too. President Nixon called to congratulate Holton on election night and Holton asked him, "Can you take a moment to do me a favor?"

"Talk to Jinks?" Nixon asked. "Well that too, but I want you to talk to my children."

The President did. He invited them, Tayloe, Woody, Anne Bright, 11, and Dwight Carter (named for Ike), 3, to the White House. In December, the adult Holtons and the three older children went, to a governors' family conference on drug abuse. Woody got pounded on the shoulder by the President. Tayloe got asked advice about a music group that was to play for the conferees that evening.

Holton is a man who made some difficult decisions, took some chances, hung in there for 19 years, cheerfully accepted some humiliating defeats, and emerged victorious. Reporters who have followed his campaigns say he revels in the race. He's made it clear also that he's not averse to wallowing in a win.

What man alive wouldn't glory in being able to call to his 10-year-old son, "Woody, can you step over here for a moment? I'd like you to speak on the phone to my friend, the President."

Nobody doubts, least of all Governor Linwood Holton Jr., that beyond the win are four difficult years. He'll be a Republican governor in a watchful state with a Democratic legislature. He'll have campaign rhetoric to live up to, delicate appointments to arrange, continual new crises to master.

That he made it this far was a surprise to some. That he brought along with him impressive qualities of aggressiveness, self-confidence, efficiency, determination and practicality by now should be a surprise to no one.

"one who never had any political activity at all."

Lukewarm on politics, Jinks was content to follow family tradition. The turning point came during the Christmas holidays 18 years ago.

Jinks was at home on leave from her job with the Central Intelligence Agency when a friend invited her to a Yule party. She was told that she would be escorted by a young Roanoke attorney, Linwood Holton.

To the Cupids, Jinks and Lin seemed a likely match.

Both had been educated in the north, were extremely independent and had definite goals.

Big Stone Gap native Linwood Holton, the son of the president of a small railroad, left Washington and Lee University during his freshman year to join the Navy. He served 33 months in the U.S. Submarine Force before he graduated from Harvard Law School in June, 1949. He liked tennis, skiing and serious reading. He had always wanted to be in politics and once said:

"If you keep your sense of humor, you can have a great time in victory or defeat."

Jinks, a graduate of Stuart Hall, majored in French at Wellesley College and Middleburg College before she fulfilled her ambition—a trip to Paris with someone else picking up the tab. The U.S. Government answered her request. Her ability with languages landed her a two-year job at the American Embassy in Brussels, Belgium, one which enabled her to spend a great deal of time in Paris, she said. When she returned to the U.S., she took a job with the CIA.

During leisure hours she liked to knit, ski, play tennis and read French novels. She was intrigued with life in Washington and vowed she would not ever return to Roanoke to live. This vow was to be broken.

Linwood Holton and Jinks were married in 1953, after Lin, a $75-a-week attorney, waged a successful matrimonial campaign by driving a creaky old car to Washington every weekend to see her.

They settled in Roanoke where Lin continued his struggle to build a two-party system. He ran unsuccessfully for the House of Delegates, taught Sunday school, eventually became an elder at the Second Presbyterian Church and a Commander in the local Naval Reserve unit.

By the time their second child was born, Jinks had managed to train him to deposit his dirty socks in the clothes hamper and not on the floor.

But he had been a bachelor too long for her to expect him to make other revisions, she said.

"His worst habit is just stepping right over toys or whatever else is on the floor in his path," she said.

Jinks was eight months pregnant with their fourth child when she ventured into the campaign arena to boost her husband's first bid for governor.

"We never thought he'd win," she said. "We approached the election with the idea that we'd get known in '65 and win in '69."

Their baby was born about a month after the election. He was to have been named for his mother's grandfather, the late Robert Carter Jett, Episcopal Bishop of Roanoke. But the Holton children, Tayloe, 13, Anne, 11, and Woody, 10, insisted that their baby brother be named after a man who seemed like their grandfather—Dwight Eisenhower.

"He came to Richmond to help us campaign," Jinks explained. "He let the children ride with him in a motorcade. They had a great time. They thought all the crowds were waving at them."

Like many other mothers, Jinks spends half of her life in a station wagon. But in the fall of 1969, she rearranged the car pool schedule for her children's after-school activities and returned to the campaign trail.

Traveling with the wives of three other Republican office holders, Jinks seekers, she made a swing around the state in a motor home named the “Hi Jinks.”

She avoided podiums and speech-making. She went to coal mines, tobacco warehouses and peanut fields to meet Virginians and ask them personally to vote for her husband.

During the busy weeks of campaigning, she became aware that many citizens across the state had a great interest in consumer education, she said. In addition, she observed a lack of cultural opportunities for Virginians in rural areas.

The problem is one that has concerned her for a long time, said Jinks, whose own cultural tastes are varied.

She once led a great books discussion for children and was active in a community theater where she did everything from building scenery to playing character roles.

One of her passionate interests is in music which she pursues with a 17-member group called “The Salon.”

Members range from professionals to beginners but all study individually under a teacher who instructs adults only. Periodically members meet for an all-day work session at the homes of those members who own two pianos. They work on theory, harmony and play duos and duets.

“Performance is not our goal. We don’t ever play for the public although we’ve had a few sessions to which we invited our husbands and patient friends,” said Jinks.

“Sometimes our group is used by a professional musician who wants to air a concert selection—sort of like Broadway uses Philadelphia and Boston for previews."

Jinks will have to withdraw from "The Salon" during the next four years while she is in Richmond, but the group is one she would like to invite to the Governor's Mansion for a session, she said.

In her role as First Lady, Jinks said her first obligation will be to make sure that her home is a smooth, stable base from which her family can operate. She would like to make the Mansion accessible to all Virginians, she said.

She is vitally interested in drug abuse programs, cultural programs, and consumer services. "Since Lin's election, I have received many calls from persons across the state who have suggested a coordination of consumer services," she said.

"It may be possible for some of the people in the state agencies to train volunteers to go into the neighborhoods and assist women with their consumer problems. One of Lin's thoughts is to enlist the help of some of the women's organizations and use them as an extension of the state government."

Taxpayers can expect the First Lady to run the Mansion with a tight-fisted rein on the budget.

Jinks scrutinizes newspaper food ads when making her grocery list, buys meats on special, clips coupons and buys day-old bread.

"But too often, people in the least financial straits fail to give grocery shopping that much care," she said.

Although at this writing, their move to Richmond is but a few weeks away, the Holtons have made few plans.

Jinks has never been upstairs in the Mansion where a spacious private apartment is reserved for the First Family.

"Mrs. (Mills) Godwin told me she is leaving the place completely furnished so that all we'll have to bring is our clothes, books and portraits," she said. "I imagine we'll leave portraits behind and substitute toys."

The Holtons have not ruled out the possibility of sending their children to a public school, but no matter where they go, Jinks sees no possibility of a letup in chauffeur duties.

"Any way you look at it, the children are going to have to be transported," she said grimly.

What we can't determine is whether it would be better to plop the children in a public school where all the children are from the same neighborhood and fairly settled or whether we should put them in a private school where all the children assemble from different neighborhoods."

The Holton children aren't nearly so worried about where they'll go to school as whether the move to Richmond will have an effect on their popularity with the Headstart School set.

"They've been putting on puppet shows for the headstart children in Roanoke and they hope to continue when we move," said Jinks. "They're not hotsy-totsy performers—they just enjoy it."

There is one other problem the Holtons must resolve before mid-January. That's what to do about their Roanoke house.

"We still haven't decided whether we'll rent it furnished or not. The fact that we don't have to take any furniture to Richmond makes it a real possibility," Jinks said. "Sometimes I feel like telling someone they can have it rent free if they'll fix up all the things we neglected during the campaign."

state Senate seats. He won, collecting 28,000 votes, again leading the ticket. And, in his first Senate session the following year, his youthful appearance was unintentionally emphasized by a veteran Senator. "It was my first day in the Senate," Reynolds would tell campaign audiences later, "and I spotted an elderly Senator snapping his fingers for me to come over to his desk. Instead of discussing some legislative matter, as I thought he would, he asked me to fetch him a cup of coffee. I got the coffee for him, and I don't know if he ever found out that I was not one of the Senate pages!"

During that Senate session, Reynolds secured passage of a bill which strengthened Richmond's attempt to upgrade substandard housing. It was a first for the Commonwealth. In the meantime, he served on the Governor's Commission to merge the Medical College of Virginia and Richmond Professional Institute into Virginia Commonwealth University. At work, he had become assistant treasurer of the company, and he had been elected executive vice-president of a Reynolds Metals subsidiary, the Reynolds Aluminum Credit Corporation.

In March, 1969, Reynolds announced he was a candidate for lieutenant governor. "I will seek support among those who believe that our state government, under the leadership of the current Democratic administration, has accepted the responsibility of achieving for Virginia her rich potential," he said in announcing his candidacy in the July Democratic primary. "Yesterday's problems in rural Virginia become today's problems in the urban areas," Reynolds said. "The migration of the poor and unskilled from rural to urban areas has only served to compound their problems, and those of the cities to which they have migrated."

J. Vaughan Gary, Third District Congressman for 20 years and an early advocate of Reynolds' entrance into public life, said of the Senator's candidacy, "He has everything to qualify himself for public office. He has both youth and experience." Not all were complimentary of the Reynolds announcement, however. His political foes again labeled him too young and too inexperienced to hold such a position.

In late March, Reynolds issued challenges to fellow Democrats who might also be interested in the nomination he sought. He was told that his money and organization were too much to match; his early use of billboards was cited as an example. Grumblers were silenced, however, when he offered to eliminate from his campaign all the usual paraphernalia and, instead, meet potential opponents in open debate across the state. With the April filing deadline, Reynolds was opposed by only one serious contender—a representative of the "old guard" wing of the party.

Throughout his primary campaign, Reynolds repeatedly emphasized that the state, in the years ahead, must concentrate on two items in particular: the strengthening of public education in areas where resources were lacking, and the stimulation of further economic development. He suggested technical and vocational training be upgraded in the state's rural high schools, and the establishment of "skill banks" in those schools to entice industries into the areas. By drawing on his experience both in politics and business, Reynolds said he would ask the state's next governor to let him be a salesman for Virginia—expanding its industrial and economic growth.

Attacks on the Reynolds wealth were fought with humor. "My father told me that—under no circumstances—could I buy the office of lieutenant governor," he told campaign audiences. After a pause, he would add, "But, he said I could rent it for four years if I wanted." The joke never failed to arouse a crowd. Another rally pleaser was Reynolds' story of a heckler who shouted from a backed auditorium, “What have you got besides your money?”—and how a second heckler answered from the back row, “He’s also got his father’s money!”

Reynolds easily won the primary nomination; he was the only candidate who escaped an August run-off election. He captured 242,000 votes (64 percent) and, like his record breaking campaigns for both the House and Senate, he collected more votes than anyone ever had before in a Virginia primary election.

When Bill Battle won the gubernatorial nomination in August, and Andy Miller had become the candidate for attorney general, Reynolds was again on the campaign trail. Crisscrossing the state throughout September and October, speaking in behalf of the party’s ticket, he was busier than ever before in his bid to become lieutenant governor. “I can say one thing,” he often said, “win or lose, I’ve seen every part of the state and I’ve gotten a great education.”

On one of his several trips to Southwest Virginia, he sat speechless during a motor tour through the ruins of a deserted coal mine town. Then, in Big Stone Gap he saw numerous automobile license plates from Ohio, Illinois and West Virginia, and was told they belonged to Virginians forced to move out of the state for employment. After the trip he renewed his campaign pledge to expand the state’s economic and industrial growth, and to stop the migration of young people out of Virginia.

Reynolds rejuvenated the “barnstorming” campaign technique. Despite his strenuous, daily schedule, he planned a “blitz” tour each week. On a tour through the Seventh District in late September, he made 15 speeches (including two breakfasts) in two days, from Charlottesville to the Shenandoah Valley and back, and then lamented, “Even I’m sick of hearing myself.”

The voters were not sick of hearing Reynolds. They flocked to his rallies, coffees and headquarters openings. They mobbed him for questions, comments and political chitchat. After listening, they would get his autograph, or his photograph, or his notes as a souvenir. Then, in November, over 452,000 voted for him.

“He’s on the right track,” one voter said of Reynolds. Another said, “I like what he says.” “He’s what Virginia needs,” said still another. Sargeant Reynolds meant something different to each voter, but—no doubt—they all considered him an exception to the ordinary rules. Sargeant Reynolds is no ordinary young man.
Andrew Pickens Miller

that contributed to making him a rather shy, serious-minded young man. While he's still serious-minded, it must have been years since anyone described Andy Miller as shy. He has a winning personality and a quick, trial-lawyer's mind, that combine to make him project well before an audience or in personal contact.

Enthusiasm and intensity were hallmarks of his campaign. Listening to him warm up an audience with an anecdote or two, you got the feeling that he could have made it big in the entertainment field. His winning the attorney general's office is a tribute to his hard work and determination. Using his personal funds, and with no organization behind him, he drove around the state campaigning. Of course, many people remembered his father and were prepared to welcome him warmly. Liberals, college students, labor and Negro groups flocked to his support. He won many endorsements from the latter groups. Miller also had an active coterie of young lawyers all around the state, who knew him from his work as chairman of the Younger Lawyers Section of the Virginia Bar Association, and as president of the state Young Democratic Club.

And in a political period when charisma is becoming the sine qua non for winning politicians, Miller has it. He might have won on intelligence and ability alone, but youth, charm, and good looks doubtless aided his cause.

"He's warm without being a glad-hander," said Doris Miller, his wife and number one fan. A match for her husband in intelligence and charm, Mrs. Miller took to the road last summer to campaign vigorously for him.

VIRGINIA RECORD
Founded 1871
"He is the kind of person—and I think that’s the reason for his success—that when he’s with you, or the children, he’s really with you. He can concentrate and make a very intense relationship. He listens intently. And I think this is true in his political life. He concentrates, he zeros in and focuses on the person or the problem. Sincerity is a sort of overused word, but he is involved and he does care about the things he’s talking about."

Is he the kind of husband who remembers anniversaries and birthdays? "I’ve always felt it bad to test people on that," Mrs. Miller said. "Why wait around to see if he’ll remember? I don’t let him forget. I tell him. Basically, it’s not important."

Miller likes to talk about his three children. He’ll happily describe 9-year-old Julia Lane’s ballet debut before a crowd of 3,000 in Knoxville, when she took part in the Barter Theater’s production of “A Mid-Summer Night’s Dream.” He is pleased that Pickens (Andrew P. Jr.) is an all around boy, who at 9 is in the fifth grade and enjoys playing in the basketball league. Father and son enjoy games of touch football. The youngest, Elise Givhan, he thinks, could end up as president of General Motors. She’s very persistent, very sure of her views, and her ability to cope with any situation on the basis of charm."

Asked whatever happened to the shy youth, Miller explained, "As time goes on, you develop a greater confidence in yourself and a greater sense of humor and perspective on events, so you’re not quite so uptight about things."

Miller attended Deerfield Academy in Massachusetts, then graduated magna cum laude from Princeton University, where he was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. He lost his first bid for Student Council there, but won a second one. More importantly, he won the heart of the dean’s daughter. Andy likes challenges, and he calculates that since Doris was the only girl living on the Princeton campus, the odds were about 3,000 to 1.

Doris, who had majored in English and graduated from Vassar the year before, was commuting to New York where she worked for McGraw-Hill publishers in "an extraordinarily dull job," writing professors, seeking material for blurbs to use in advertising college textbooks.

Col. Miller accepted an invitation to speak on the campus and stayed at the dean’s house. Young Andy was invited over to Sunday dinner.

The impression he made on his future wife was scarcely overwhelming. "It was a funny thing," she recalls, "I’m a year older and my first impression was that he was a mere kid. You know when you’re 21 and 22, a year seems like a lot."

When he asked her for a date the next weekend, having nothing better to do, she accepted. "That’s when I was really impressed with him," she said. They were married eight months later in August of 1954, and until the next May, Miller was a student at New College, Oxford, studying politics, philosophy, and economics. Here, too, he followed his father, who as a Rhodes Scholar had studied at Oxford years before.

From Oxford, he went into the Army, and was sent to Korea. There he spent 16 months "looking through field glasses over a demilitarized zone at Chinese looking through field glasses at me." His tour was considerably brightened by his wife’s decision to go to Japan. "Talk about an odyssey of true love," he said. "She got on a Japanese freighter, went to Japan and found a job with the Fulbright office there." He spent his rest and recupera-tion periods with her in Japan and once she flew to Seoul.

There being no place to spend money anyway, he saved his salary and leave time and when his tour was over, the Millers took off for a dream trip through Southeast Asia, visiting such spots as Saigon, Singapore, Malaysia, Manilla, Hong Kong, Cambodia, and Japan, before returning to the states.

Both are extremely interested in archaeology and a highlight of the Southeast Asia tour was a trip to Anhor Vat. He still recalls the absolutely eerie effect that viewing remnants of a lost civilization had on them as they saw gigantic jungle trees growing through the old temples.

More recently, the Millers have traveled to Mexico and Guatemala to dig in the ruins of the Mayan civilization. They hope soon to accept an invitation to join a friend on the faculty of New York University for a trip to the university's archaeological site in Turkey.

After Miller's tour in the Army was completed, he enrolled in the University of Virginia's law school, where he edited the Virginia Law Review and graduated first in his class.

It was inevitable that the top graduate of one of the country's leading law schools would get many tempting offers, and Miller did. One might naturally expect a sophisticated young man to join a Washington or New York law firm or go into corporate law. Miller considered all those possibilities.

In another of those coincidences brought to light in this political year, Miller interviewed at Reynolds Metals Co., with the idea of joining their corporate law staff. Everything went well enough until he was dispatched to take a personality test. He decided that was ridiculous, and that he didn't want to join a department that based decisions on anything so tenuous as a personality test. That ended his fling with corporate law.

As for Washington or New York, Miller finds life in those cities somewhat artificial. "I don't feel you have a great sense of what's going on from that vantage point," he said.

People invariably ask how he ended up in Abingdon.

Having decided that he wanted to stay in Virginia, he also decided he didn't want to be part of a large law firm which might frown on its younger associates being involved in politics, which he certainly intended to be. Also, he wanted more independence than a large firm would offer.

So when George Rogers Clark Stewart of Abingdon talked to him about joining his two-man law firm, it seemed to offer everything he wanted. The firm had an extensive practice in Southwest Virginia and Miller considered Abingdon a rarely charming town. A theater buff, he was attracted by the Barter Theater's presence there. But most of all, it offered the challenge of immediate responsibility with the firm, which has since grown to six members. "And that's how I got to Abingdon," Miller explained.

Once there, he happily settled down to a busy life as a trial lawyer, whose work ranged over criminal law, civil litigation, annexation suits, and the entire legal spectrum.

Miller became active in Democratic affairs on both local and state levels and when Robert Y. Button announced his retirement Miller decided to run for the attorney general's office.

"Without sounding immodest the pursuit of competence or excellence always appealed to me and this represented another kind of challenge. One of the things that appealed to me is the challenge to see what can be done with the state's law firm. I want to see that Virginia’s state law..."
firm becomes one of the top firms in the country, not because of the rating, but because it will be fulfilling its potential and giving service to the state agencies and to the people that it should provide."

He noted the increasing complexities of government—federal, state, and local—and said he believes all three must put greater emphasis on competence and responsiveness.

Miller plans to give special attention to recruitment and plans to institute a summer intern program for law students. The office presently has a staff of 18 attorneys.

Miller's political career had an auspicious beginning, but he isn't sure where it's going from here. "As much as I like politics, I think I love law more," he said. "The administration of justice is going through a difficult period and I'm sure there're any number of challenges in that area that may interest me. I really think, at some stage, a judicial career will appeal to me."

"I'm really not the type of person that prestige or status means that much to. Basically, it's a question of making some contribution to the society in which you live in an area in which you may have some competence."

Mary Stuart (nicknamed "Cricket") are children from her previous marriage to Joseph Stettinius of Richmond. The three children, back from a shopping spree and visit with Santa Claus, arrived home as we talked about the family horses. After an exciting description of their trip downtown, the twins began to list the other animals in their "family zoo." "We have a cat named Whitey," said Joey. Teddy added, "and she just had two kittens . . . but we gave them away." Joey went on, "We have two gerbils and two goldfish . . ." and his twin brother interrupted with "and a dog named Julie and three finches." "Don't forget the parakeet," their mother reminded. Cricket, in the meantime, was gathering up the freshly wrapped gifts they had brought home and was busy distributing them beneath the half-lit Christmas tree.

As the children rushed off to play, our conversation moved on to Mary Ballou's honeymoon trip across Europe. "While in London we had a chance to sit through a couple of hours of Parliament while it was in session. But, I think Sarge enjoyed that more than I," she said. In Rome they visited the Vatican—"I remember saying," she said, " 'With a place as beautiful as this, you know God is in here!'" Later, they visited the Colosseum. "What was so amazing to me was the guide saying restoration on the Colosseum began in 1750—can you believe they began restoring it before our country even began?"

It was snowing in Paris, Mary Ballou said, but they had fun seeing the American film, "Midnight Cowboy" with French subtitles. "The greatest thing about our trip," she said, "was that we went everywhere we wanted and we didn't skip a thing, or miss a single plane." She credited Sergeant with keeping them on schedule, saying, "Sarge doesn't waste time hurrying."

I changed the subject and asked Mary Ballou why she thought her husband would make a good lieutenant governor. After a brief, thoughtful pause, she replied, "For one thing, I think he is the fairest person I have ever met in my life. He is a very appreciative person, and I think he is a very sensitive man." After more thought, she added, "Sarge says we are living in the best time in history—and I think he's happy to be taking part in our government during this great time. I'm glad he is."

Before I left, we exchanged holiday wishes, and then I was again out in the yard filled with the white, blinking lights from the boxwoods. Glancing back through the living room window I spotted my hostess back to work again on the broken Christmas tree lights. Moving on out to my car, I couldn't help but remember Mary Ballou's comment, "We don't suffer from boredom around here."

Stripping the situation to its bare essentials is one of her biggest intellectual assets.
With her liberal arts and travel background, her “bright and healthy” children and her active husband, she feels herself to be a lucky woman.
The personal inventory of her life is not, in many ways, different from the lives of thousands of other women in private as well as public life—it’s her handling of the goods that makes the difference.

It’s what enables her to say frankly that she had four campaign dresses that she alternated, that her car is an old one, that she isn’t the “green eye shadow” type—that she is, in fact, her own woman.

Blue eyes, simply-styled hair and one of the most remarkable smiles below the Mason-Dixon Line don’t hurt the public image, either.

But that, after all, is an accident of birth, rather than an attitude.

Mrs. Miller’s attitude is what an artist might call “a sense of wonder” or a clergyman “a sense of gratitude,” or what a casual acquaintance might label simply “a sense of humor.”

It’s all those things combined with the special Doris Miller personality.

The personality is most recently keyed-up, harried in a breathy, attractive way, wound up for the move to Richmond and all its question marks.

“We don’t have a house down there yet,” she explained by phone. “But we’re going down after the holidays to hole up with friends and look around.

“The children are doing fine; they’re excited. But right at the moment we’re all in Limbo. I don’t want to break up housekeeping here until after Christmas, just to keep the holidays intact.”

She remembers election night in Richmond as “trips between the John Marshall Hotel and Democratic headquarters,” and congratulations from family and friends.

Right now, planning for the inaugural weekend looms close on the horizon.

still "until summer. I want to get the feel of the city," she said, "and get to know the legislature; that's one of the main reasons I want to get down there as soon as possible.

"But first, the children have to be settled and placed in school. After that, I would like to investigate some civic work in the arts or theater, or possibly some literary activity.

"But I don't want to jump in with both feet. I'd rather belong to a couple of organizations and work well for them than to join too many and accomplish nothing.

"And, of course, I want to put the new house in order so that we can begin, little by little, to entertain again."

The Miller philosophy in action: home, family—then the social aspect.

The new year, the new era of the Miller family life, will find the lady of the house where she's always been: right around home.

The Winds Change

Virginia as a Democratic State in the present age is part and parcel of the mystique about the land and Virginia's deep reluctance to accept that it is, in fact, a modern urban state, economically based upon industry.

The out-going Governor Godwin might be called the last of the Byrd Organization governors — though in reality the Organization then was a dwindling rear-guard and already too advanced for some of the rural-oriented counties. Governor Godwin, of course, could not adhere to some of the outmoded fiscal doctrines and, in a day when every politician must be labeled, could probably be classified as a "progressive-moderate." It seems to me that Fred Pollard, William Battle and Linwood Holton could all fit under that same hat. I do not believe that any one can reasonably expect any significant change from Godwin to Holton. I don't think the General Assembly or the state would stand for it; and, as Governor Holton seems an eminently reasonable man, there would be definite limitations on what he could attempt to change.

What has changed is in the minds of the Virginia people. There has been entirely too much stress on "the moribund Byrd machine." Senator Byrd controlled the Democratic State Organization in a different age. Countless of the old dependable voters for "the Organization" are now opposed to it because under Godwin the state government made some effort to adjust to the changing age. What was clear in the Democratic primary and run-off, with their low votes, is that the state has become politically fragmented. This was tacitly recognized in the election of Governor Holton as representing "a change"—a change from the fragmentations which the primaries and run-off showed to exist under the obsolete name of the Democratic Party.

This is not remotely to suggest that the Republican reflects an unfragmented solidarity. As has been frequently pointed out, Holton's supporters made strange bedfellows. It could even be inferred that his majority was formed more by voters against something than for something. But that was the way the National Republican Party came into being more than a century ago, in the 1850's, and won its first national election on a split among the Democrats in 1860. Today in Virginia, Republican seems to stand primarily for not being Democratic, not being associated with the myth, with the lingering aura of the "moribund Byrd machine," with the out-dated mystique of the rural community as represented by the court house crowds.

This, however, is not to infer anything negative in the Republican position because it is fundamentally anti all the Democratic associations. Either going on from Godwin's progressive moderation or going off on some progressiveness of his own, Governor Holton will have the support of that majority of Virginians who have demonstrated at the polls that they want their state to adjust to the changing age. But, as they have demonstrated nationally, they definitely do not want their state to adjust to the National Democratic principles as exemplified by the Kennedys and Johnson. I think they would want mostly what Nixon said, during his campaign, he would provide.

Finally, with all the explanations for Virginia's embracing "a time to change," the election of Governor Holton certainly showed that the old Old Dominion is not as set in its ways as its detractors claimed and, truthfully, as its admirers sometimes feared. It is at last again, after about 140 years, more attuned to the winds blowing across the nation as a whole rather than those drifting up from the Gulf States. Whatever the tenure of a Republican governor in the Governor's Mansion in Capitol Square, or the extent of Republicans in our state and national legislative bodies, for 1970—exactly one century after Virginia was legally re-admitted to the Union—it can be only regarded as a positive good that the state has established a two-party system.

What we do with this changed condition, as the editorial writers say, "remains to be seen."

If you're just using us for telephones, we're not doing all we should for you.

We should be offering you new ways to be in touch with the branch offices faster. We should be setting up a way for you to make calls to regular customers or suppliers within a certain area at lower rates. We should make sure you're not losing customers or clients because of a traffic jam at your switchboard. And if the transmission of data is a problem for you, we should be helping with that, too.

We can, you know. We have equipment and systems to solve any problem that occurs in business communications. And we have specialists to work with your company and see what we can do to help you. They're called C&P communications consultants. They cost you nothing. We should send one over to your company soon. Just call your C&P business office, and tell us you'd like one.

Fast, semi-automatic switchboards handle more calls in less time, with room for expansion.
