WE'VE BEEN MINDING YOUR BUSINESS FOR A LONG, LONG TIME.

Five generations. That qualifies as a long time in anybody's bank. We've been around since 1865 and have helped a lot of Virginians solve a lot of financial problems. Like keeping a hardware business hammering away. Or a farm growing.

One of the best methods of making sure that your affairs (business or personal) stay in order is to name Fidelity as the executor of your will or as trustee of your estate. Or both.

Acting as executor of a will isn't easy, and we don't ask one person to do it. Of course, you have one person to contact, but he's backed up by a staff of experts. Your executor must tend to many details: he must plan for the current needs of your beneficiaries or your business, contact insurance and investment companies, check on mortgages, file complicated tax returns and on and on. The details are staggering. But since our people have years of experience they'll probably save your beneficiaries a good deal of money.

There's no doubt that you need a will, and you probably need a trust account also. Because a trust account can really save your beneficiaries money. When you pass on and for years to come.

You see, our trust experts can move money around (via prudent investments, tax brackets, property management, and so on) so that you get every tax advantage available. And by now, there's hardly a situation we haven't come up against. After all, we've been at this for a long, long time. But c'mon, test us. Call one of our trust officers. # ASPHALT PAVING

The Before and After Surface

Asphalt paving—as an access road or strip—permits vehicles or equipment to use construction sites at the start of the project.

After its temporary service during construction, the layers of asphalt are converted into a permanent surface for the intended use.

Modern, full-depth asphalt is the only kind of paving material that can serve building contractors and their customers before and during building construction, as well as after completion.

How? Well, asphalt paving—as an access road or strip—permits vehicles and equipment to get into and use construction sites right at the start of the project. This kind of paving is called "stage construction." And usually it involves:

From the start of the project, an asphalt paving mat supports trucks, cars, and equipment as they move in and out of the project site. It enables construction to continue, even in bad weather. If it is a road or highway job, traffic can use the paving even before final completion.

After its temporary service during the construction period the initial layers of asphalt paving are easily and effectively converted into a permanent surface for the use intended. Usually, the original courses of asphalt paving serve as a base for additional layers of asphaltic material, thus providing a full-depth surface to serve present and future needs.

Yes, asphalt is economical, dependable, and versatile. It's the only surface that's with you from the start of your construction work through its completion—and still with you, serving your needs, many years into the future.

The First Shall Be First, and the Last Shall Be Last

RECENTLY I EXPERIENCED a pleasure of a sort which I'd supposed would never come again: I enjoyed a highly praised contemporary novel. It was John Fowles' Daniel Martin. As an old pro who has spent his adult life in various aspects of the publishing business, out of habit I continue to subscribe to a number of journals that feature book reviews, though (like many other professionals) I pay little heed to most reviews.

The raves are suspect on the grounds that the writer either belongs to the same cult as the reviewer or writes in a trendiness of the moment to which the reviewer subscribes. Negative reviews are of two kinds: those partly or wholly unfavorable or, what is called in the trade, "a bad review" or "a blast." As the late Stephen Vincent Benét said, an unfavorable review is valid (if unpleasant to read) as long as it is "fair, objective and intelligent." The bad review, which is neither fair nor objective and often for intelligence substitutes a heavy-handed humor, is plainly a vituperative attack on the author under the guise of a book review.

The motivation behind this vitriol could be one of many: the reviewer could be violently opposed to the author's viewpoint or the reviewer could be jealously resentful of the author venturing into a field the reviewer regards as his own; or it may be no more than that the author has inadvertantly touched a nerve and the reviewer reacts contemptibly by releasing venom on an author who cannot strike back. Fortunately, these blasts are few in number. Even so, I inwardly cringe whenever I read one, though the author is unknown to me and the subject unfamiliar.

On Mr. Fowles' new book, I've read nothing unfavorable, not a hint of some reviewer's display of spleen, and the raves so vary in emphases and points of praise as to negate the possibility of any cult support, and the book is anything but trendy. Having said all this, I do not wish my own enthusiasm for Daniel Martin to suggest that this is "an easy read" that must not be missed.

It is very long, more than 600 pages most of which are rather dense. The few dirty words could be counted on the fingers of one hand, and are always appropriate to the context and not used for fashionable shock value. It is the opposite of "action-packed" or "hilarious," and indeed at times, especially toward the end, it is slow going.

But I think it aroused all the hurrahs because of its highly civilized reflectiveness about vital aspects of life in England (mostly Oxford) and in America (mostly Los Angeles) in the past quarter-of-a-century. Secondarily, the few sex scenes are presented more or less obliquely, with the emphasis on what is happening in the mind rather than in the explicit descriptions which have turned many of us away from contemporary

We're committed.

Over 100 million seedlings back up this commitment to regenerate our forests.

Ever since the 1930's The Chesapeake Corporation has been practicing intensive forest regeneration. Reforesting over 150,000 acres throughout our woodlands in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina. In fact, during the 1972 season, we planted our 100 millionth pine seedling!

Encouraging cooperative forestry programs throughout our region has also been an important part of Chesapeake's reforestation program. When equipment scheduling permits we will reforest private land at cost or will give the landowner, at no charge, up to 10,000 seedlings on a matching basis to reforest his land.

At Chesapeake we believe in the forests. They have to be protected and wisely used to supply man with his growing needs.

63rd Governor of the Commonwealth to be Inaugurated January 14, 1978

JOHN NICHOLS DALTON will be the 63rd Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia when he is inaugurated Jan. 14, according to the State Library and the Report of the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

The line of gubernatorial succession beginning in 1776 includes Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson and James Monroe.

The count of 63 is of those persons who held the title of Governor and omits those who served as Acting Governor or Provisional Governor. Some Acting Governors served as briefly as four days.

The count includes Francis H. Pierpoint, who served as Governor in 1865-1868 by appointment of United States authorities.

It also counts twice those Governors who served non-consecutive terms. They include Patrick Henry (1776-1779 and 1784-1786), James Monroe (1799-1802 and January to April, 1811), William "Extra Billy" Smith (1846-1849 and 1964-65) and Mills E. Godwin Jr., (1966-1970 and 1974-1978). Counting these Governors twice follows precedent set by the federal government, according to the State Library.

A complete listing of the Governors of Virginia, from 1606 forward, can be found in the Report of the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Governors during the colonial period were generally appointed by the British Crown.

"After the colony declared independence," the Report says, "a constitution was adopted which provided for the election of the governor by the General Assembly for a one-year term. A governor could be re-elected to serve a total of three consecutive years."

From 1776 to 1852, the Report says, the governor was chosen by the General Assembly. If a vacancy occurred through death or resignation, the senior member of the Council of State acted as governor until the Assembly was able to elect a successor.

"The Constitution of 1851 abolished the Council of State and provided for the popular election of the Governor for a four-year term," the Report says.

While others have served non-consecutive terms, Godwin is thus the only Governor ever to be elected twice by popular vote.

63RD GOVERNOR

JOHN NICHOLS DALTON

By

ALLOONS rose and fell, hundreds of jubilant celebrators roared, television cameras went tight on the podium and John Nichols Dalton claimed victory in the hard-fought 1977 Virginia gubernatorial election. It was a moment to remember, up there in the glare of the lights, the winning candidate surrounded by family and friends: the culmination of months of nonstop campaigning, years of planning, and years more of hoping.

But the true significance of election night, 1977, was easy to miss amid the hoopla. The night Virginians chose John Dalton as the 63rd Governor also marked the end of one era and the beginning of another. The struggles which began in the 'fifties and 'sixties were at last put to rest. Politicians who had capitalized, in one way or another, by pitting the little boys against the big boys, or white people against black people, were soundly rejected. Younger men were given their chance.

It is a chance that John Dalton intends to make the most of.

Immediately upon winning the election, Dalton thrust aside the divisions of the campaign. He attributed victory to support from Republicans, Democrats, Independents, conservatives, moderate liberals, blacks and whites.

"More people have been involved in this campaign than in any campaign in the history of Virginia," Dalton said, and promised government to represent all the people and help them solve their problems.

John Dalton sincerely wants to "make life better for all Virginians," as he said over and over again during the campaign, and conditions seem right for a progressive, effective Administration. While they were electing Dalton governor, the people also gave his Republican party four more seats in the General Assembly and defeated some of the more partisan Democratic members of that body. Without taking the legislature for granted one Dalton can look forward to a reasonably good working relationship with it. The legislators, however, are interested in doing good things for the state and will no doubt work well with a Republican governor if they can't have a Democrat.

Also the same day, the people gave strong approval to a $125 million bond issue for various construction projects around the state. The money will meet several serious needs and give the economy a small stimulative boost.

A cooperative legislature and money in the bank for a building program would appear to be excellent scene-setters. But a political factor makes the future even more favorable: the crushing size of Dalton's election victory itself.

The state has had narrow elections recently, notably the 22,658-vote margin by which Gerold Ford carried the Old Dominion in 1976 and Governor Mills Godwin's 15,000-vote squeaker against Henry E. Howell in 1973. Such close elections tend to be polarizing; the arguments over which factors were decisive, what late-campaign tricks were used, and so forth, can drag on for years, paralyzing political discourse and clouding the future. But you can't argue much about a margin of 60,000 votes. It is just there, like a mountain or a monument, and it must be acknowledged. Howell's narrow loss in 1973 inspired him to try again; his crushing defeat in '77 caused him to count himself out of future statewide races, thus clearing the air in the Democratic party and opening the way for younger men and women.

Such a winning margin is both a rejection and an affirmation; a rejection of a style of politics based more on exploiting issues than addressing them and an affirmation of the values and goals emphasized by the winner. If anyone should argue, for example, that Virginians don't want economic growth, the strongest counter-argument is that John Dalton stressed the continued need for economic growth. If anyone says public-sector unions should have the right to bargain with city councils and boards of supervisors, it can be said in rejoinder that Henry Howell said that, and look what happened to him.

Like an explosion or an earthquake, a decisive election clears away what is present and affords the opportunity for new creation, and it is just such an opportunity that John Dalton will seize.

It is easy to underestimate John Dalton. He seems too nice a guy to be really successful in politics. But he has never lost an election, so he must have some traits or characteristics his fellow citizens find pleasing. Perhaps it is his smile and infectious good humor. More probably it is the sense that this man who is a pillar of his community, an Eagle Scout, a fraternal leader, an experienced legislator and a successful lawyer and businessman, is somebody you can trust and count on. People expect him to do what he says he is going to do, and over the years few people have been disappointed.

What will he do, and what will he not do?

The negative list is short. He will not sign away the state's right-to-work law. But the chance of his having the opportunity to exercise a veto on a repeal bill is minimal in any case. He knew that, and discussed it during the campaign mainly to point up the genuine philosophical difference between him and Howell on the issue.

He will not allow collective bargaining for state employees. The possibility of this choice is very real; the legislature has come close to legalizing collective bargaining in the past. But with the certainty of a gubernatorial veto, ways other than collective bargaining will be found to secure the rights of public employees and pay them adequate wages.

The positive list is much longer. Throughout the campaign, Dalton talked about things that needed to be done and put forth numerous positive proposals. Some got little attention, but Dalton kept plugging away, convinced that people were looking for a candidate who would address issues in a positive and responsible way.

The development of the state's economy and her energy resources will likely be at the top of Dalton's agenda. It was no accident that one of the first things the Governor-elect did, less than 36 hours after the polls closed, was to fly to New York with Governor Godwin to speak to the annual Report of Top Management sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce. Dalton's election and his personal interest will assure national business leaders that Virginia is still one of the best places to invest.

Dealing with the energy problem will be trickier. You can't get oil or gas out of the ground with goodwill trips. Dalton proposes to create an energy commission to plan the development of energy resources, particularly offshore oil and gas, and to look hard at the future: are the utility companies building enough generating capacity? Can demand be dampened by means short of punitive rates? These questions have hardly even been asked so far, and Dalton's commission will search for the answers.

Dalton will also strive for better oversight of utility companies. He does not think they are inherently evil; he does think they should, by virtue of their monopoly status, be more responsive and accountable.

He thinks education in the Commonwealth can be improved through more emphasis on classroom discipline. Too many teachers are pushed around in their own classrooms and feel they have no protection against aggressive students; Dalton supports a proposed standard requiring each locality to adopt a code of conduct.

As strongly as he believes in anything, Dalton believes in openness in government. As Lieutenant Governor, Dalton set a standard by holding "Open Door" meetings across Virginia, in which citizens could meet with the second-highest state official to discuss their problems and concerns. As Governor, Dalton is pledged to expand that concept. He will go around the state and take the Cabinet with him.

Dalton's promises were few, specific and concrete. He goes into office with a firm idea of what to do instead of a laundry list of promises aimed more at collecting votes than framing public policy.

But obviously, Dalton did well at collecting votes; nearly 700,000 of them, making him the all-time champion gubernatorial vote-getter. You have to go back to 1961 to find a gubernatorial candidate winning by such a percentage.

Defeated but still defiant, Henry Howell laid the blame for his weak showing on Dalton's direct-mail campaign, which Howell claimed distorted his positions on the issues. The first massive Dalton mailing was in mid-September, and it caused Howell to blow his stack. The letters laid out the issue differences between Howell and Dalton and invited voters to make their choice. This, said Howell, was unfair.

There was another mass mailing, but Howell didn't talk about it. Presumably he held his tongue because the second mailing included documentation of the statements in the first. It proved that Howell had indeed talked of raising taxes, repealing the right to work law and other actions not acceptable to the broad body of Virginians. Howell didn't bring this to the attention of the media.

Other Democrats laid the blame on the efficient Republican

"phone bank" operations. In type of operation, well known practicing politicians across country (including Howell whose Norfolk-area phone bank probably won the primary for him), the voter is contacted and asked his preference. However, voters were struck from the list, undecided voters were sent by churches, or letters outlining Dalton's positions on the issues of concern to them; and solid Dalton voters were put on a list to be called back and urged to vote on Election Day.

A number of large "bank" spread across the state contacted thousands of voters in this person-to-person manner. A host of smaller operations run on shoestring budgets by local volunteers out of collection agencies, law firms, insurance agencies and other companies with a lot of telephones rounded out the program.

More visible kinds of communication were used also. An eight-page tabloid-size advertisement was inserted in most daily newspapers. Billboards urged citizens to "Keep Virginia Green with Dalton." Radio and television ads stressed Dalton's personal qualities and his plans for a better tomorrow.

The name of the game, Dalton strategists saw it, was to build voter familiarity with Dalton's name and issue positions. Since these positions were considerably closer to those held by the Virginia electorate than with Howell's, the final outcome was virtually inevitable once people got to know Dalton.

A deliberate decision was made to sink nearly half the advertising budget into the Northern Virginia area, which has a considerably higher proportion of transient voters than other areas. Fewer Northern Virginians identify with the state's sense of tradition and its innate conservatism. They look for a reasonable candidate willing to speak to issues. Dalton campaigned exhaustively in Northern Virginia and his helpers took pains to arrange news media coverage. He addressed important issues; just when the local water authority was imposing water use restrictions, for example, Dalton announced his support of a technological solution to the long-range shortage. His firm and reasoned positions on other issues proved more attractive to people, downstate as well as in the Washington area, than his opponent's more flamboyant style.

All the advertising and campaigning cost a considerable amount of money, of course, nearly two million dollars. To some extent, this was beyond Dalton's control. Television stations, not campaigns, decide how much commercial time will cost.

And there appears to be little doubt that Howell outspent Dalton heavily in the last week for TV time. By then it was too late; the blitz did Howell no good. It may even have harmed him. Running numerous commercials in the Richmond area, for example, did little but alert anti-Howell conservatives that the election was coming up.

The campaign's treasure chest was filled to a significant extent by persons giving $5, $10, or $25. In the financial report filed 30 days before the election and thus covering more than a year of fund-raising, more than 85 percent of the individual contributions were for less than $100, and Dalton's average contribution was about equal to Howell's. Dalton just got more of them, partly through an efficient direct-mail effort, partly through large events, such as a breakfast which attracted 1,200 persons at $10 per head, and partly through the efforts of local finance committees across the state which beat the bushes for money. A contribution not asked for is generally a contribution not given, and so a host of Dalton supporters were put to work asking for money. It came in a steady flow.

There were, of course, a number of persons giving $1,000 to $5,000 and a few who gave even more. But no one person, or small group of persons, can look Dalton in the eye and say, "my money got you elected."

John Dalton is himself no stranger to large sums of money. He is a successful attorney and owns a substantial amount of farmland in Pulaski county. Newspaper reporters figured out the supposed worth of his holdings, using somewhat inflated property values, and announced that Dalton was a millionaire.

The fact is that his cash income makes him comfortable but not rich, and the land is not necessarily saleable at the prices mentioned. But the label stuck: Dalton, formerly known as the state's lieutenant governor, or as an attorney, became a millionaire lawyer.

Howell sought to make Dalton's worth an issue, accusing him of being unable to relate to poor people by virtue of not being poor. The tactic boomeranged; most Virginians likely hold to the idea that a man who acquires a lot of money or property through his own honest efforts is to be praised instead of vilified. And it heightened the impression of Howell as a man willing to use almost any weapon he could lay his hands on.

This impression was first thrown into high relief on August 20, when Howell stood before the AFL-CIO convention and accused Dalton of "feathering his nest at the expense of the public interest," of having used his service in the legislature to advance his own personal financial interest. When pressed for proof, Howell could come up with only a minor banking bill, the exact effect of which was so obscure that a major newspaper assigned its financial writer, instead of a political writer, to figure it out.

The lasting impression of the episode was not that Dalton had "feathered his nest," but that Howell had slung mud. Virginians, it seems, are still unwilling to reward name-calling.

This self-destructive habit of the Democratic campaign was largely responsible for turning what should have been an asset into a liability, or at best a wash for President Carter's visit.

Presumably at the behest of the Howell forces, Mr. Carter devoted his remarks largely to attacking Dalton, who at that point was less known than Howell. Sticking to the high road of pragmatism, Howell would have been more appropriate; Virginians traditionally dislike outside interference in their politics, and Carter's visit apparently did Howell little good.

Before Carter's criticism came a steady flow of invective from Howell. He denounced Dalton in terms rarely heard in Virginia. He tossed in a reference to the Nazis for good measure, saying Dalton's campaign literature was as bad as the products of Hitler, a propagandist, Goebbels. Other blasts came at point-blank range during joint appearances of the two candidates. Dalton's attempt to discuss the issues was being buried by Howell's showy but insubstantial rhetoric. Howell's slanderous attacks continued, using the handy forum of the joint appearances, until Dalton decided to pull the plug and called off future side-by-side appearances. Among the victims was the proposed televised debate in Williamsburg. But the biggest loss was Howell himself, whose overdone attacks cost him the valuable free exposure that debate would have brought.

Another major decision by Dalton is ranked among the "milestones" of the campaign by his strategists. This was his demand that an independent political group "cease and desist" from its attempt to sponsor anti-Howell television commercials.

The spots were produced by a group of conservatives who organized under the name of the Independent Virginians for Responsible Government. In retrospect, the IVGR episode may have been a case of a sound theory which was badly executed. Perhaps there is nothing wrong with commercials designed exclusively to expose the faults of an opposition candidate. But the very idea chilled many people, and the group's first product, a fund-raising letter, caused intense controversy because it mentioned the volatile issue of busing. The anti-Howell spots themselves were cheaply produced, and looked it. Furthermore, they contained a major error in discussing Howell's record on collective bargaining for public employees.

Dalton felt this was unacceptable. He asked the group to cancel the ads, which were yet to actually appear on TV, and the IVRG complied, thus closing an unfortunate episode and raising Dalton's stature as a man willing to rein in even his own supporters when they have their facts wrong.

When he wasn't busy fending off his opponent, Dalton was crisscrossing the state in a fleet of borrowed automobiles and aircraft, bringing his message of "progress and prosperity" to anyone who would listen. One of the significant but overlooked facts of the campaign (truly significant indicators always seem to be overlooked, except perhaps by the pollsters and a few natural born geniuses) was the size of the crowds Dalton drew almost everywhere he went. Starting with the kickoff luncheon March 1 and going right down to election night, Dalton's crowds were encouraging. The rank-and-file Republicans were looking for a winner; moderate and conservative Democrats were looking for an alternative if Andrew Miller lost the primary; and moderate independents were simply looking for meone they liked. Hundreds turned out to see Dalton at any dozens of events across the state. Many came out of curiosity, for despite Dalton's service as Lieutenant Governor, he wasn't well known at first. As he gained confidence and improved as a speaker, the bandwagon started to roll. By the middle of October, barring a disaster, Dalton was a shoo-in.

There were really two campaign trails, because you have to hunt the one blazed by Eddy Dalton, the candidate's wife. Eddy (short for Edwina), who met Dalton on a blind date, was a relentless campaigner with a seemingly inexhaustible supply of good cheer and vivacity. During Dalton's campaign for Lieutenant Governor in 1973, she hit upon the idea of handing out a little cookbook instead of the usual throwaway brochure. In 1977, the cookbook was expanded and printed in color on glossy paper and became an item in much demand. At least one male voter took it in fond hopes his wife could learn something. Republican women's clubs raised money through bake sales using Eddy's recipes.

The Daltons were together about once a week. But every night before going to bed in another strange motel, John would pick up the phone and call his wife.

The campaign was a grind, but Dalton seemed to thrive on it. He enjoyed meeting people and talking about his favorite issues. In speaking to Republican groups, he laced his talks liberally with his own practical experience, telling them that telephone banks certainly do work: he used one himself during his law school days to carry Charlottesville for Eisenhower. He told the young workers who form bumper-sticker brigades that he, too, had plastered the Dalton name to auto bumpers, back in the 'fifties when his father was running for governor.

For the Dalton name is nothing new to Virginians. John's father, Theodore Roosevelt Dalton, known universally as Ted, was a mover and shaker in the Republican party when there was little to move and shake. Dalton shook 'em up in 1953, however, when he ran a strong race against the Byrd Organization candidate for governor, Thomas Stanley. Senator Byrd himself had to intervene to save Stanley. Dalton ran again in '57, but that was the fall President Eisenhower sent the troops into Little Rock, Ark., to enforce a desegregation order. "That wasn't a little rock, that was a big rock," Dalton mourned as Virginia voted for a hard line against integration.

John Dalton was born not to Ted but to the sister of his wife, Mary. John's parents were divorced when he was four and he was sent to live with Ted and Mary in Radford. Little John rode a train from Radford every Friday to Bedford to spend the weekend with his mother. At the age of 15, he decided that since Ted was the only father he had ever known, he should be formally adopted, and it was done.

During his youth, John Dalton got into politics through his father, who served in the State

"Ted" Dalton

Senate. Campaigns were planned around the kitchen table. Dalton attended public schools and The College of William and Mary, where he won an election to become student body president. Then on to law school at the University of Virginia, with two years out for the Army. On moving back to Radford to enter law practice with his father's firm, young Dalton discovered that there was a lack of offices to run for; the available public offices were held by Republicans, friends and law partners, not the least of which was Senator Ted.

Dalton plunged instead into party politics, such as the Young Republican organization, while he bided his time. He joined civic groups, worked hard and became well known in the community. He decided his time had come in 1965. The target was a seat in the state House of Delegates. Dalton and his helpers put every family in the district on index cards, and the young candidates headed out to call on every home. The legwork paid off; Dalton won handily.

When he got to Richmond, however, Dalton found that the ruling Democrats were unwilling to acknowledge the upstart Republicans. The leadership actually refused to put Republicans on major committees. Even the most senior Republicans hardly ever got to go to committee meetings. (The minority retaliated by appointing a "monitor" to each major committee, a Republican member who would go and listen to the committee business and then report back to the caucus.) This ridiculous system was finally discarded by John Warren Cooke when he became Speaker in 1968.

One of the Republicans Cooke felt was especially promising was John Dalton. The Speaker appointed him to such weighty committees as Courts of Justice and Appropriations. Dalton also served on a commission appointed to straighten out the tangled state courts system, which included various courts of different jurisdictions and made the trying of a suit more like Russian roulette than a judicial proceeding. Dalton was chief patron of the resulting reform bills, shepherding them through the House.

He also served as chairman of the commission which tackled the difficult problem of how to reclaim land devastated by strip mining. Dalton was able to achieve a workable measure of this politically explosive subject.

Politically, Dalton kept winning re-election to the House with little difficulty. In 1972, however, State Senator James Turk was elevated to the federal bench and his legislative seat was vacated. Dalton became the Republican

First Lady of the Commonwealth

EDWINA PANZER DALTON

By PAT BRYANT

JANUARY 1978

WITH THE inauguration January 14 of John Dalton as governor of Virginia, the state will have in its new first lady a leading proponent of volunteerism.

Even in the midst of her husband's campaign for governor, Edwina Panzer Dalton found time to attend to some of the volunteer activities so dear to her heart—especially the Cancer Society and the Infant Hearing Screening Program at Radford Community Hospital.

An adherent of the idea that "So many good things have happened because someone saw the need and got it going," she has given freely over the years of her time and talents to recognizing needs and doing something about them.

Typical is the hospital infant hearing program with which she has been associated for many years. She was one of the leaders in bringing the program into the hospital after hearing of its success elsewhere. She was trained to do the testing and helped others get training so that infants—some before even being cleaned up after delivery—could be checked immediately for any hearing difficulties. These tests became part of the babies' hospital records so new parents would know if their infants had any hearing problems. Today, the hospital has two nurses on the staff who fill in when volunteers are not available—as when a prime advocate of the program is on the campaign trail.

Never one to say to other groups, "You should do this," rather she is more of the "Why don't you look into it" type of persuader. And so, she hopes with the help of Mrs. Fred McCoy of Radford to interest hospitals around the state in setting up infant hearing screening programs. Mrs. McCoy, who has worked with Mrs. Dalton on the Radford program, is a board member of the Virginia Hospital Auxiliaries Association and Mrs. Dalton is "hoping for a volunteer group to get it started" wherever there's a hospital without the program.

A long-time worker in the Cancer Crusade, Mrs. Dalton will be putting in appearances around the state not as first lady but as cancer educator. Part of the crusade (in addition to fund-raising) is informing the public of the cancer danger signals and the necessity for early detection. She and Mrs. M. Pinson Neal of Richmond have developed a pilot project for the Virginia Division of the American Cancer Society in which programs will be held for local groups to inform the volunteers before they go out to instruct the public.

Even during the gubernatorial campaign she found time to attend a Virginia Division board meeting on which she now serves as an at-large director, and to arrange for actress Elizabeth Taylor (Mrs. John Warner of Middleburg) to attend the Virginia Division kick-off meeting Feb. 14 in Charlottesville along with national Cancer Society president Dr. Marlin Perkins.

When she decides to work for a cause, she works—she's not just a figurehead, although she'd already begun serving as honorary chairman for groups and programs before the inauguration. But for the Cancer Society, her efforts are those of doing—1976 state crusade chairman, a member of the statewide committee 1976 and again in 1977.

And she's not about to let up on her volunteer projects just because she's moving to the Governor's Mansion. She's moving into the mansion with no pre-set ideas as to what imprint she'd like to leave on Virginia history as far as programs are concerned but with a very firm idea of what her job as first lady will entail. "I haven't set any goals for myself—I don't anticipate my life changing that much . . . I'll be wife, mother, hostess, go to my volunteer work like I've always done."

First lady duties will have to come first. "Katherine Godwin said if she could give me one bit of advice, it was to clear my schedule with my husband's." So she already has begun coordinating her calendar with that of the new governor and the demands on her time already are beginning to mount.

The mansion will be a busy active house for the next four years, for this is an energetic family with children who range from 13 to 20. There is Katherine, 20, a pre-med student at the College of William and Mary.

ge of William and Mary, Ted, a freshman at James Madison University; John Jr., 17, a senior at Radford High School (he'll remain in Radford for the remainder of the school year to graduate with his class); and Mary Helen, 13, an eighth grader. And there's a Dachshund, "Governor," who joined the family bird dogs—"Senator," "Chief," and "Judge"—in 1969.

Mrs. Dalton entertains frequently at home and things will be no different in Richmond. She'll start right off, immediately after the inauguration, with a luncheon for family, the other new state officials and some special guests at the mansion, remembering her own experiences four years ago. "One of my best memories of the last inaugural" was the luncheon the Godwins gave at the mansion.

And remembering, too, how pleased she and her husband were when the governor and his wife attended the Dalton fund-raising party on the Friday night preceding the Saturday inauguration four years ago, so, too, will the Daltons attend fund-raisers planned this time by Lt. Gov. Charles Robb and Attorney General Marshall Coleman. In fact, Mary Helen had chosen her two dresses—for Friday night party-going—that will include a joyous event given by friends from Radford, and the Saturday night inaugural balls at the John Marshall and Jefferson Hotels—by late November.

But she was slightly behind her mother in wardrobe planning. "I watched the polls," said Mrs. Dalton—and with confidence ordered her cream-colored silk ball dress with beaded top a month before the election.

And even more of an optimist and positive thinker is 20-year-old Kathy Dalton. A year ago, while attending a basketball tournament at the Coliseum with her parents, she said to her father: "Daddy you get elected governor and I'll see if I can get accepted at MCV (Medical College of Virginia med school), and we'll both have it made." Half of the battle is done and with her grades, the family isn't too concerned about Kathy's making it to med school and taking up residence in the mansion in two more years.

The mansion will be seen by a lot of Virginians during the next four years if Mrs. Dalton has her way. There will be the traditional receptions for the General Assembly members and a coffee for the wives during the 1978 session. But there will be other events, too, because: 1. John Dalton was heard frequently to say during the campaign, "We look forward to having you come to Richmond;" and 2. Mrs. Dalton promises, "A lot of people want to see the governor's mansion and they're going to have the opportunity."

One group lost no time in assuring itself a bid to the mansion. The Daltons belong to the Dutch Dinner Dance Club in Radford and at the big town reception that welcomed them back home after the election, the head of the club was heard to say to the new governor-elect: "Don't you remember inviting us to the Dinner Dance?"

And even if they all come it won't faze Eddy Dalton. A few years ago Congressman William Wampler was to be guest of honor at a party at the Dalton Home. "John didn't want to exclude anyone and the invitation went out to the whole city of Radford. I think it was even on radio and in the newspaper." As so often happens when there's a reception to which "everyone" is invited and apparently "everyone" decides to come, the weather didn't cooperate. "It rained and we stood outside in the rain—John, Bill and I under a big golf umbrella welcoming everyone."

The Daltons lead a family-centered life with three generations enjoying many similar activities. Back home in Radford are his parents, Judge and Mrs. Ted Dalton, and her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Panzer (who built a home in Dublin, near Radford, after he retired from Ford Motor Co.). It was the grandmothers who virtually ran the Dalton home during the campaign, although the ever-well-organized Eddy Dalton somehow even managed to have trick-or-treat candy ready for Halloween. There have in the past been family hunting trips which gave Mrs. Dalton a chance to tramp through the woods to her delight; and relaxed summers spent on a grazing farm on Claytor Lake, where the house that burned down will have to wait now another four years to be rebuilt to welcome three generations of Daltons. So busy have the past couple of years been with political and volunteer affairs that there hasn't even been time for waterskiing, a favorite sport. Even getting to Lisle, Illinois, to see her brother, William E. Panzer, has been out of the question, but reunions have occurred. "You're going to laugh, but we fly into O'Hare Field (in Chicago) and have lunch." William Panzer has his own business in Lisle, manufacturing what his father calls "God Bless Bill Tape" because it's the best tape in the world."

While not a women's movement activist, Virginia's new first lady works for the improvement of women's rights in her own, quiet way. She has served on the Virginia Commission on the Status of Women, was coordinator of the Bicentennial Scholarship Fund, designed primarily to secure greater educational opportunities for mature women and those planning to re-enter the job market, and was honorary chairman of the commission's Bicentennial Task Force.

She will do her banking in Richmond at the Woman's Bank, is proud that "my husband voted for" the part of the Virginia Constitution that guarantees equality for women and believes that omen should receive equal recognition and opportunities and pay. But she doesn't believe women should be put in a separate category. Nor does she think the family should be denigrated. Thoughtfully she says "I have a 10-year-old daughter who is a pre-med student and I want it so she has a choice."

Family has always been top-most in her thinking and planning and her own choices have been toward family first. She was Ford Scholar majoring in history at Michigan State University in 1955 when she first met John Dalton who was visiting in her hometown, Cincinnati, Ohio. He was a William and Mary graduate who had completed two years of law school at the University of Virginia and was a lieutenant serving in the Army at Ft. Knox, Kentucky. They were married the following February, during her sophomore year at Michigan State. The next September, released from the Army, John Dalton returned to U.Va. to finish law school. Eddy Dalton enrolled at the university but again her education was interrupted—in April, Kathy was born.

With his graduation from law school, the Daltons went home to Radford, where she quickly got caught up in community activities and began her career as a volunteer that has included regular service at Radford Community Hospital, PTA, Radford Woman's Club and teaching Bible school and Sunday school at the First Baptist Church. In more recent years, she has been named to the executive committee of the Parents Association at the College of William and Mary.

There came a time, too, when children were independent enough for her to return to college and so she enrolled at Radford College and finally got her B.A. degree. In 1976, the college named her its most outstanding alumna of the year.

The Governor's Mansion, she finds, is a beautiful house. There's even a rose garden which, while not her own back in Radford, will at least give her some opportunity for gardening. There's a beautiful dining room table that will seat 32 and a mirror-walled dressing room that would be the envy of any woman and that answers a yearning she's had for years.

But what there isn't in that historic old house is a kitchen in the private, upstairs family quarters. There's a well-equipped kitchen in the basement to handle just about any order the governor's family might place. But what's a woman who's always done her own cooking, who is acknowledged as more than just a casual performer in the kitchen, who turned her talent at the stove into a pamphlet that helped get her husband elected lieutenant governor in 1973 and was expanded into a booklet for the 1977 campaign going to do? On a tour of the mansion, she discovered what purports to be a kitchenette upstairs in what once was a bathroom. There was a two-burner hotplate, a small sink, a pullman size refrigerator and some shelves. That is no answer to the frustration a cooking first lady must feel. But with her ability to see a need and do something about it, she probably will see and do. And maybe four years hence, there'll be a sequel to the cookbook pamphlet—"Gourmet Meals on a Hot Plate" perhaps?

FINE BRICK IS A LOT LIKE FINE CHINA

When tapped together, fine brick, like fine china, produces a ring all its own. And, like china, the ring of brick is an indicator of its quality.

The tones produced by brick vary according to the finish and texture of the end product. (A ceramic engineer will often make a quick kiln test for cracks by listening to the ring of the newly fired brick.) The sound range is enough that brick from the Sanford Brick and Tile Company has been used to record such songs as THREE BLIND MICE, ROW ROW ROW YOUR BOAT and MARY HAD A LITTLE LAMB.

Of course, your interest in brick is to build buildings — not play games. But then the ring of quality produced by Sanford Brick can make music in your next building project.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR

CHARLES S. ROBB

By
STEPHEN R. FLEMING

JANUARY 1978

HE DID NOT dominate the classroom during his law school years at University of Virginia, a friend recalls. "He was always prepared; he just didn't steal the show."

Charles S. Robb was older than most of the other students, embarking on a new career after almost a decade of military life. He didn't steal the show, but he left evidence that "Chuck" Robb had been there. As president of the Student Legal Forum he brought a series of prominent speakers to the University. Officials who worked with him then remember Robb as outstanding, a description used by his former commanders and, more important, by his former noncommissioned officers.

Ask a sergeant what makes a good officer and he'll say, Leadership, by which he means something more than military knowledge or skill. He means pretty much what the political pros mean when they say, Charisma.

Before Law School, Robb spent a day at the University dramatically different from his quiet years there as a student. He went to Charlottesville as a recruiter during the angry years of the Vietnam War. All day he stood behind a table in the Student Union, a Marine major in dress uniform. Anti-military students manned the next table, trying to keep an argument going non-stop. Participants recall Robb never raised his voice, never spoke a harsh word.

"He's impressive," said an unsympathetic student who did not know the young officer was the son-in-law of Lyndon Johnson.

"He's kept his cool," observed a sergeant-major who was sympathetic. "That Major Robb is all Marine."

Eight years later "Chuck" Robb again caused a stir on the grounds of the University. This time he was a candidate for Lt. Governor sending ripples through the student crowd as heads turned and conversations halted in mid-sentence.

The sergeants said he had leadership. The political pros called it charisma.

Another Charlottesville story reveals much about the young man who will be sworn in as Virginia's Lt. Governor on January 14. It is told by Russell V. Palmore Jr. who remembers "Chuck" Robb, the amateur athlete.

"'Chuck' was always the one to organize athletics," Palmore recalls. "It wasn't what most people expected of him."

Palmore remembers a football afternoon when they were on opposite sides: "A couple of passes were thrown to 'Chuck' and for one reason or another he didn't catch any. I remember ribbing him pretty good."

"Then 'Chuck' caught the winning touchdown and I was guarding him. Anyone else probably would have tried to ram the ball down my throat, but 'Chuck' was very gracious and, at the same time, he was extremely happy."

That was in 1973 when Charles S. Robb was 33, when he received the Raven Award and the Seven Society Award and his juris doctor degree in June, the month he turned 34. Four years later in June he defeated two opponents to win the Democratic nomination for Lt. Governor.

Robb defied the odds to run for the state's second highest office in his first campaign. When he announced last January most of the political pros wrote him off as a celebrity longshot, the handsome husband of Lynda Bird Robb who might add glamour to the campaign but would not win.

He defied more than the odds. Conventional political wisdom holds that a newcomer needs a Goliath to slay in order to attract attention and prove his mettle to the voters and, especially, to the political pros. But "Chuck" Robb never followed the negative campaign theory. Instead, he went to meet as many voters as possible to talk about "Chuck" Robb and some ideas he had to expand the role of Lt. Governor. For the voters he couldn't reach personally, he used advertising to reach all other candidates. But more, too, the message was always positive, almost understated by the standards of political campaigns.

On election night "Chuck" Robb added some words to his victory speech, a special thanks to the greatest single asset of my campaign and my life, Lynda—not because of who she is, but because of what she did, day after day. Time and again she demonstrated her ability, her sensitivity and her compassion.

"It's a bit of an understatement to say that she didn't encourage me to seek this office, or any public office; but once she realized how much it meant to me she came on board one hundred percent. She worked hard and she worked effectively. She took a lot of the abuse only candidates normally have to take, and she proved once and for all that she's got true grit."

The candor Robb displayed throughout his campaign was not unique. More and more public figures across the country have been discovering the good vibes that follow after an honest admission in front of voters that, "I just don't know." But the candor characterized the style and substance of Robb's campaign.

All the Lt. Governor of Virginia is required to do is preside over the Senate and be prepared to take over as Governor if necessary. Beyond that, a Lt. Governor has to improvise without any real authority to do so. "Chuck" Robb believes he can provide real help in recruiting industry and in smoothing the frictions between state and local governments; he proposes to provide that help through personal persuasion and the prestige of his office. But he never pretended that the Lt.

Governor could play a dominant role in state government. "I think it's important that we recognize the limitations as well as the potential of the job," he always told audiences first.

And he would add this: "You know, politicians talk a lot about social issues. In fact, they're often considered the day-to-day grist of politics. It's easy enough for candidates to endorse sweeping solutions; but if I'm going to be honest, I have to point out that the Lt. Governor's job does not include implementing solutions. Frankly, the most effective way he can address social problems is to help recruit new industry—to bring jobs to Virginia."

Robb believed that "jumping on every headline to puff myself up would just raise expectations that the office of Lt. Governor could never fulfill.

"I don't want to puff myself up," he told audiences. "I would rather underpromise and over perform." That sentence contains as much self-confidence as modesty. Often he would add to the ambiguity by saying, "That's the policy I have followed throughout my life."

"Chuck" Robb was born in Phoenix, Arizona on June 26, 1939. His family lived in several places, but their roots were in Virginia where they returned in time for "Chuck" to be graduated from Mount Vernon High School, just outside Alexandria in Fairfax County. His roots are six generations deep in this Commonwealth. An ancestor, Thomas Lewis, served in the House of Burgesses. Another, John Lewis, helped found the city of Staunton.

His competitive spirit became evident in college. After attending Cornell on a Virginia scholarship, Robb transferred to the University of Wisconsin on a Navy-ROTC scholarship. He was active in campus politics and commanded all ROTC units. He was graduated first in his NROTC class, received several awards and was commissioned in the United States Marine Corps. At Officers Basic School at Quantico, he ranked first in his class in overall competitive standings and also in leadership.

In 1966 Robb was assigned as adjutant and ceremonial officer at the Marine Barracks in Washington—with additional duties as officer-in-charge of the White House Color Guard and social aide to the White House. There he met, courted and married his wife.

Three months after the wedding Captain Robb was in Vietnam. He stayed for a thirteen-month tour divided between command of an infantry company and a staff job. After returning home he served as the Marine Corps' chief college recruiter until 1970 when he left the service to start a new career.

In the first job of that career, Robb served in 1973-74 as clerk to Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge John D. Butzner Jr. "Chuck" and Lynda and their

LYNDA JOHNSON ROBB

Richmond Newspapers*

If a cliché could be used to sum up Lynda Johnson Robb's life, it would have to be "her life is an open book."

Not just because she is the daughter of the late President Lyndon Baines Johnson. Nor even because she's the wife of Virginia's new lieutenant governor, Charles S. "Chuck" Robb. But mostly because books—open, readable, to-be-shared books—play such a vital part in her life.

There are the books she loves to read for herself, often several at a time and frequently in the realm of history. She was a history major at the University of Texas and her interest in history is ongoing. Admitting that she had "really been starved" for books during her husband's campaign, she quickly devoured four or five books after the November election. Her choices—"people who make tough decisions," a "how-to" book, a volume on King George and another about Catherine de Medici. "My tastes are eclectic—I love history."

Her interest in history spilled over into her family. Daughter Lucinda, 9, was studying Egypt in school in McLean and even wrote a play about the early civilization. At the same time Mrs. Robb picked up a book about Hatshepsut, mid-to-late 1500s B.C. female pharaoh, while her mother, Mrs. Lyndon Johnson, had a volume on Nefertiti.

Even the hectic period of the ampaign gave her a reason to study a bit of Virginia history, familiarizing herself with the communities she visited and the people, living and dead, from those communities. Both she and her mother delved into the "great houses and interesting" people of Virginia during the campaign but it really was no chore. After all, she likes history and that includes local history.

Not content to keep the beauties, the excitement, the stimulation of reading to herself, she is probably the leading spokesman for RIF—Reading Is Fundamental. This wide-ranging program begun in the late 1960s, strives to interest children, particularly younger ones, in books by first persuading publishers to furnish the books at a discount to a local sponsor and then having local sponsoring groups furnish them to the children without cost. Each RIF program must have a local sponsor-financial backer, such as the Boys Club of Richmond, which raises its RIF money through the International Festival, or the Service League in Hampton, or the several groups that are sponsors in Northern Virginia.

Of her involvement in RIF, she admits to being "an early soldier in the ranks." And that may be a typical Lynda Robb understatement when it comes to her personal life.

She even now serves on the national and Northern Virginia boards, is a frequent speaker and "mover" not only in Virginia but around the country and whenever possible, works in "just one more" RIF appearance. There are 18 RIF programs in Virginia and about 500 across the program. But she doesn't just go and talk to the adults. She becomes involved with the children, sitting down in a school library reading area, taking a youngster up on her lap and soon attracting other youngsters to the fun. As one observer of this phenomenon commented, "If it's fun to read, it's even more fun to be read to."

So dedicated to RIF is she that one 24-hour period found her speaking to a group at night, to another group the next morning and to yet a third group in the afternoon—all in different communities. "It's time consuming but stimulating," she says. "It's something I care about and when you care, you make the time."

But there's also the side of her life—part of American history itself—that has put her in the history books. Born March 19, 1944 in Washington to then-Rep. and Mrs. Lyndon Johnson, her growing-up years were followed by the public to the extent her father's political successes increased to Senator, Vice President and then President. She attended both public and private schools in Washington and during the times when her family was back home in Texas, she was enrolled in Johnson City and Austin public schools. Graduation from National Cathedral School for Girls in Washington came in 1962.

Her college years were spent at the University of Texas and George Washington University and her intelligence shone through from the beginning, with ection to Alpha Lambda Delta, national freshman scholastic honorary. She was enrolled as a sophomore at the University of Texas when President John F. Kennedy was assassinated in 1963, resulting in a drastic change in lifestyle from daughter of Vice President to daughter of President. Perhaps the biggest change was the arrival of Secret Service men on the scene, accompanying her virtually everywhere she went from college years until her father left the White House. She was graduated with honors from the University of Texas in 1966 with B.A. in history.

Not one to take up the party social life of Washington, she was anxious to put her intellect and education to use and in 1966 became a writer for McCall's magazine, a position she retained until 1968. A year later, she became a contributing editor to Ladies Home Journal, a job she does not intend to relinquish although she had to put it in abeyance during the campaign.

Mrs. Robb, while reticent about personal publicity, is generous in giving of herself to causes in which she believes or where she feels her presence might be beneficial, whether it's the Law Vives Ecology Group which she headed up while "Chuck" Robb was in University of Virginia Law School and which she steered into a glass recycling project, or throwing out the first ball and speaking at a flag-raising ceremony to open the softball season in Lively in the Northern Neck, or taking her young daughters Cindy and Cathy along to tour the House of the Christmas Mouse which she had just officially opened in Richmond in 1973 to benefit the National Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

It was during her father's presidency that she met a handsome young Marine Corps officer over the bridge table, the officer she was to marry on Dec. 9, 1967 in what was the first White House wedding since 1942 when Secretary of Commerce Harry L. Hopkins married Mrs. Louise Gill Macy with the blessing of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Looking back over the 10 years she wryly commented that she wasn't even sure what the 10th anniversary symbol was supposed to be. And she recalled that as she had approached her seventh anniversary she commented to a friend that that seventh year was supposed to be one of significance, fraught with implications of "Seven Year Itch." To which her friend said, "That depends on whether the first years were feast or famine." The support the Robbs give each other in their projects would tend to indicate times of feast.

The Robbs had been married only a short while when he was sent to Vietnam and it was in the fall of 1968, while thousands of miles apart, that their first child, Lucinda Desha, was born. In June, 1970, another daughter, Catherine Lewis, was born.

"Chuck" Robb enrolled in the University of Virginia Law School after his return from Vietnam and the couple soon found themselves caught up in family-student-public figure affairs, with both giving time to their home in the Farmington subdivision of Charlottesville, both becoming active in law school related activities and she making an occasional appearance. Mostly, she was happiest being a quiet young woman with two children to rear. She told an interviewer in Charlottesville in 1972 "I like to blend in. I don't like to stir things up."

And so the life of young, career-minded wife and mother was her goal when she moved to Richmond in 1973 when her husband began a one-year law clerk stint with Judge John D. Butzner in the 4th U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals. She took her young daughters for endless walks in the neighborhood and to ballet classes and to a neighborhood recreation association where she joined other young mothers watching their youngsters in the "kiddie pool."

When the year in Richmond was up, the Robbs moved to McLean where they were building a house and near where so many old friends lived. Before the campaign there was time, and perhaps once the General Assembly session is over there will be more time, for those pursuits that bring her the most pleasure—RIF, the numerous boards on which she serves, her collections of antique and modern children's books, rare books and illustrated manuscripts, decoupage and archaeology. She keeps fit with tennis although she says "I came to it very, very late; not like Virginians who seem to have a tennis racket put in their hands at an early age." "Chuck" Robb is athletically inclined, plays golf and is a "good" tennis player but Mrs. Robb almost laments, "I'm not particularly athletic."

Does she ever miss the White House days? "To a certain extent, as I miss being 18, too. But change is good for you."

Is there a difference between campaigning for your father and for your husband? "Just as there is a difference between being 16 and 20 and being grown up."

ATTORNEY GENERAL
OF THE

JOHN MARSHALL COLEMAN

By

JANUARY 1978

IN MID-November, Virginia Democratic Chairman Joseph T. Fitzpatrick came to Richmond to discuss his party's future with reporters in light of its experience at the polls early in the month.

Henry Howell, the party's gubernatorial standard bearer, had suffered a thumping defeat and Fitzpatrick, understandably, was glum at the prospect of having another Republican in the governor's mansion.

Still, he wished Governor-elect John N. Dalton good luck and suggested that Democrats in the General Assembly would do their best to cooperate in getting Dalton's administration off to a good start. Any new governor, Fitzpatrick observed, generally can count on at least a short "honeymoon" with the opposition party.

One reporter noted that in addition to dropping the governorship, the Democrats lost the attorney general's race for the first time ever. Would the new Republican attorney general, J. Marshall Coleman also be getting a "honeymoon" with Democratic lawmakers? he asked.

Fitzpatrick's friendly smile suddenly turned icy. There will be no "honeymoon" for Coleman, he predicted. The attorney general-elect, he said, "did little to endear himself" to Democrats during his brief tenure in the General Assembly.

It is the kind of response that Coleman, 35, regularly provokes from partisan Democrats. Women reporters once voted him "the most gorgeous hunk of man" in the legislature but implicit in Fitzpatrick's "honeymoon" comment was recognition that Coleman is, to borrow a phrase, not just another pretty face.

In just five years, Coleman has moved up the political ladder from a freshman delegate to Virginia's second most powerful office. His tools have been a razor-sharp mind and a matching tongue, tools he has used to taunt and torment the state's conservative Democratic establishment.

And they are tools he delights in using. While other Republican legislators generally avoid scrapes with the powerful Democratic committee chairmen who can kill their bills with scarcely a wink, Coleman challenges those Democrats.

He has criticized various elements of the legislative process, attacking the Democrats' traditional practice of selecting judges in a party caucus and with little independent review of the qualifications of those judges.

He has suggested and fought for a variety of reforms in the state's lobbying laws and its criminal justice system and has pledged that as attorney general he will continue and intensify the latter battle.

He plans, Coleman said throughout his recent campaign, to be the kind of attorney general who will be at the Capitol regularly, reminding the legislators there of the reforms in the legal system he believes are necessary and pressuring them to adopt those reforms.

"And if all of you recognize a degree of confrontation in that approach," he told audience after audience, "I want you to know that I do not shrink from it. I think the time for confrontation has come on this subject."

Confrontation is a key word in any attempt to understand John Marshall Coleman. J. Harvie

Wilkinson III, a University of Virginia law professor who is perhaps his closest friend, says Coleman's greatest strength as a lawyer is an ability to confront problems directly, to separate what's important from what's peripheral.

Coleman's plan for criminal justice reform itself, as well as the method he's outlined for getting it adopted, illustrates the point.

Coleman suggests that the fundamental problem with the criminal justice system is disparity in sentencing. When a quadriplegic who was caught selling a small amount of marijuana and some barbituates gets 21 years in prison in Pittsylvania County while the sons of a Norfolk judge and a Richmond lawyer go on probation for their role in a $20,000 cocaine deal in Virginia Beach, something is wrong, he says.

Some other lawmakers have proposed a series of mandatory sentences for certain crimes in an attempt to eliminate such disparity. Coleman suggests those sentences attack only half the problem and eliminate any possibility of flexibility in sentencing which may sometimes be needed.

Coleman's solution is a series of legislatively-set "presumptive" sentences for all crimes. His plan calls for the General Assembly to decide what a "typical" first offender should receive for each crime and to call that sentence the presumptive term.

Judges who want to give the person committing that crime more than the presumptive sentence will have to be able to cite aggravating circumstances in his record to justify the extra time. Those who want to give him something less than the presumptive sentence will have to point to some mitigating circumstances.

And once sentenced, offenders will have to serve all their time, have some allowance for good behavior. The parole system, which Coleman contends has made prisons "schools for the dramatic arts," will be scuttled and the parole board will become strictly a job placement agency, finding places for offenders and offering them help once they are released.

Confrontation also is at the heart of Coleman's approach to politics. Far behind at the outset of his battle for attorney general with veteran Richmond Delegate Edward E. Lane, Coleman smoothly confronted the Democrat on an old and sensitive issue—race.

He quietly reminded black voters of Lane's support of "massive resistance" to school desegregation during the 1950s and prompted those voters to confront Lane and ask for an explanation.

Later, when the race issue seemed to fade, Coleman confronted Lane with the Democrat's sponsorship of a series of bills designed to benefit the savings and loan industry. He suggested that those bills, coupled with Lane's private legal work and directorship of a Fredericksburg savings and loan association illustrated a conflict of interest.

Lane countered that the bills had not benefited him and that Coleman had voted for all of them which came to the floor during the Republican's years in the legislature. The merits of the bills were not the issue, Coleman replied; the question was whether Lane should have sponsored them.

While the conflict charges generated much less public interest than the massive resistance issue, they kept Lane on the defensive. As Coleman concentrated on pouring $90,000 into a last minute advertising campaign that portrayed him as an energetic, bright young man with some good ideas, Lane was fending off charges that he was a product of the political buddy system.

The end product was a surprisingly easy, 80,000 vote win for Coleman in a race everyone, including Coleman, thought would be close.

His critics acknowledge that Coleman's confrontation tactics are politically effective but suggest that when it comes to getting things done they are counterproductive.

Throughout the campaign, Lane insisted that if Coleman seriously tried to shove his criminal justice program, or any other program, through the assembly he would be laughed out of Richmond by the Democratic majority. He recalled that Andrew P. Miller, a Democratic attorney general, had to endure the indignity of having some of his assistants barred from assembly committee meetings by Democratic committee chairmen who pointedly suggested that Miller stay out of legislative affairs and concentrate on running his own office.

Wilkinson acknowledges that Coleman's confrontation style could produce some problems in his dealings with the assembly but predicts that his friend will "smooth out some of the edges over time." Coleman understands that he needs Democratic help to accomplish his legislative goals,

Wilkinson said, and will do what he must to get that help.

Another key to Coleman is ambition. The race against Lane was his third in five years and Coleman did not argue last spring when a reporter suggested that he is something of a "political junkie."

Edward E. Willey, the veteran Democratic state senator from Richmond and perhaps the most conservative man in the legislature, suggests that Coleman "is the most dangerous man ever to run for public office in Virginia" because he will say and do anything to further his ambitions.

His foes suggest that ambition got in Coleman's way early this year when the assembly considered a plan to change the way judges are selected. The bill, proposed by Senator William F. Parkerson, D-Henrico, was similar to one Coleman had long championed. It called for creation of an independent nominating commission to conduct a non-partisan screening of judgeship candidates and make recommendations to the legislature.

Recognizing, he said, that a strong speech from a Republican might turn some Democrats against the bill, Coleman stayed out of the Senate floor debate. But after the bill lost by a single vote, he ripped its Democratic opponents in a biting speech.

The problem was that the bill wasn't completely dead, at least not before the speech. Parkerson had managed to get it sent back to his Courts of Justice Committee following the floor defeat and hoped to touch it up enough to win over that one last vote.

Coleman's speech, Parkerson complained, raised enough partiin Democratic hackles to doom his effort. If judicial "merit selection" was a cause Coleman wanted to advance, Parkerson said, there were plenty of better ways available to advance it.

Coleman does not deny that he has ambitions but he and his friends suggest that those ambitions are one of his strengths. In business and industry, Wilkinson notes, ambition is a quality which is encouraged. Why, he asks, should government be different?

Though Coleman's ambition is evident in any examination of the public man, it seems to fade in private encounters. Politics and the law are his deepest interests and Coleman can and does discuss both endlessly. Few who know him and have talked about these subjects with him privately doubt that his desire for criminal justice reforms is sincere.

The private Coleman is witty and engaging. The wry wit the politician uses to poke fun at Democrats emerges as the centerpiece of a low-key sense of humor in private. More than one woman reporter has acknowledged that more than just looks were involved in the "gorgeous hunk of man" balloting.

A native of Staunton, Coleman was raised and educated in nearby Waynesboro before going on to college at the University of Virginia. In 1966, as a first year law student at U.Va., he suddenly dropped out and enlisted in the Marines, serving 13 months in Southeast Asia. He returned to Charlottesville and got his law degree in 1970, setting up his legal practice in the firm of Lotz, Black, Coleman and Gudal in Staunton.

Coleman and his wife of six months, the former Niki Fox of Richmond, will be taking up residence in Richmond's Fan District when he takes over his duties as attorney general early in January. Each has two children by a previous marriage, though the couple has custody only of Mrs. Coleman's children.

NICOLS FOX COLEMAN

By PAT BRYANT

WHEN AN ARTIST says "What I paint is so far out . . ." it's almost natural to assume she paints in the bold, brash colors, the abstract forms and shapes to be found in what is commonly considered "modern" art.

Not so with Niki Coleman, wife of Virginia's new attorney general, J. Marshall Coleman. She amplifies: Her paintings are ultra realistic landscapes, in the manner of 18th century landscapes that are so old, they seem "far out" compared with much work emanating from artists' studios today. "Now, though", she says, "the realists are beginning to come out from under the rocks."

Her techniques, too, are the old fashioned ones in which layers of paint are used to build up the images with which she fills her canvases.

It's been a year, however, since she's "touched anything." But hardly a year of idleness. It was a year that saw an acquaintance ship ripen into friendship and then into a romance for the strikingly handsome couple from Staunton. Mrs. Coleman was divorced, with two children, a job as assistant manager of the book store at Mary Baldwin College and a wealth of interests. As in the way in a community the size of Staunton, her path and that of Marshall Coleman crossed often. She helped him as a volunteer with his campaign for the State Senate two years ago and worked as he sought the Republican nomination for attorney general.

By the time the party's nominating convention was held in June, the two knew marriage was imminent. Time was the only problem. When would Coleman's running mates—John Dalton and

st. Governor-candidate Joseph Canada—be free to come to the wedding. The ceremony was going to be in Charlottesville in the University of Virginia Chapel with just immediate families and the running mates present. Somehow, everyone found a satisfactory date but then time again became a factor. The only time the chapel was available on July 9 was 9 a.m. And the only time the reception given by her parents, Lt. Col. and Mrs. Julian P. Fox Jr., could be held was 4 p.m.—in Richmond.

She had been Mrs. Coleman only a matter of minutes when she learned what was ahead for the next four months until election day. As they emerged from the chapel, they were met by a news service photographer needing "just one more for the deadline." Friends loaned them a condominium at Wintergreen for a two-day honeymoon, then it was back on the campaign trail for him and back to Mary Baldwin for her for two weeks to train her replacement at the bookstore.

Even before Coleman had a campaign staff, he had a trained volunteer in his future wife. While she majored in art at Mary Baldwin with emphasis on history and painting, her minor was English, which she has repeatedly put to use over the years since graduation in 1964. Summer vacations from college were spent doing news writing, while a period of residency in Charlottesville permitted her to work in the University of Virginia news office and to do some free-lance writing. Writing press releases and helping with correspondence came easily.

Her out-going personality, warm smile and gracious manner made campaigning seem easy to those she met, even if the pressures of constant travel and always being on display to the public might have been unsettling. Looking back on it, she said, "It's not something you take a course in," the day-to-day organization of things, the "trying to keep everything you need with you; the changing of cars only to find you've left your address book and note paper behind and won't be back that way for five days."

In retrospect, she has no trouble recalling the one single most horribly memorable day of the campaign. There is an annual event in Staunton, the Relief Sale sponsored by the Mennonite Church, to which thousands of people come to buy the beautiful handmade articles offered. She had carefully instructed campaign personnel that that was one thing she absolutely wanted to attend, no matter what. And with that in mind, a new scheduler carefully arranged for her to be in Northern Virginia that morning, ride in a parade on the Eastern Shore in the early afternoon and then fly to Staunton for the sale. She was on the road to the Eastern Shore at 5 a.m., and somewhere along the way acquired two mosquito bites on the face that left her with swollen spots over her eye and cheek and feeling "lumpy and dumpy." Assured that there would be no trouble catching the plane that was to take her from the parade to Staunton, she and her driver took off for the Eastern Shore airfield, not knowing that the pilot had decided another field was nearer the parade route. There followed a Keystone Kops routine of car moving up and down the highway to find the "BP station and turn right" that would put them at the landing field where the plane waited. It wasn't until patience, understanding and the dikes that hold back tears of frustration had worn away that they learned that the special BP station had been a Gulf station for a month. When she finally scrambled into the plane—"it was no more than an enlarged bumble bee"—she rode "squeezed in with my knees under my chin" to Staunton, where she discovered that 50 people were still on hand at the sale, which may have been fortunate. In the rush to get on the plane, she left all her campaign material in the car and had exactly 50 little cards left in her jacket pocket.

The days following the campaign and election were scarcely less harried than those leading up to Nov. 8. There was a house to buy in Richmond's Fan District, painting and papering to do, children to settle into new schools. Her daughter, Holly Williams, 12, and son, Taylor Williams, 10, will be joined on weekends by his two sons by a previous marriage, Sean, 8, and Billy, 3½, who live in Staunton.

The Colemans are very much a "family" family. Friday nights, before marriage, were devoted to dinner with all four children. And the things they enjoy are quiet, home-centered activities—music, reading, cooking, movies. "We're both workaholics," she says, with projects always under way. Even when reading, they usually have several books at hand to match reading matter with mood or interest of the moment.

Niki Coleman jokingly says she's always threatening to paint walls shiny brown and when she says "I'll paint," she means she literally could do it, but whether she would is another matter. She admits to being the "tool person in the family," and even asked for a tool chest as a Christmas present to facilitate her projects. However she decorates her new residence, it will be with taste and perhaps a bit of Continental flair, underscored by artistic talent. She acquired these traits through experience and training. Born in Staunton in 1942, she lived with her career Army family in such places as Germany, France, Japan and Taiwan while she was growing up. After Col. Fox retired in 1963, they returned to Virginia where he became town manager of Lawrenceville, a position he held until 1965. He later served as chief of Virginia's Office of Gerontology (now the Office on the Aging). He died in October during Marshall Coleman's campaign. Young Nicols Fox was graduated from Mary Baldwin in 1964 and went to work at the National Gallery in Washington for six months in what was mostly a logistical position. As coordinator of children's tours, it was her lot to get the volunteer docents with the children five times a day and to make sure everyone was pointed in the right direction."

Following her marriage to an investment banker in 1964, she lived in Charlottesville for four years, working at the University of Virginia and teaching school. For the next seven years, home was in Belgium and England where her children learned French and the "British" English that made school strange for them when she and they returned to Staunton. Seeking a new life for herself, she enrolled in Madison College to renew her teacher's certification and work on a master's degree. She got the certification, dropped the idea of a master's when her philosophies of art did not coincide with those of her instructors and took the job with the Mary Baldwin bookstore.

She has had one one-man show of her art work and has exhibited in other shows. Seeing her paintings and sculpture side by side would make one doubt they were executed by the same person. As her paintings are 18th century realism, so is her sculpture the other side of the coin. She does the "Henry Moore type of thing

... forms and shapes interest me." She has no difficulty sculpting a single animal in an abstract manner but the "a-leaf-belongs-on-a-tree-in-a-proper-setting" philosophy governs her paintings.

One feature of the new house is a tiny studio, "really just a storage room with a window." But a place, nonetheless, where after a year's hiatus, she can once again take up palette and brushes and tackle a canvas—but not the canvass that results in vote totals.

minee and such was the local Democrats' respect for his electability that they declined to run anyone against him.

State Senator Dalton had only one single session, however, before another opportunity for advancement presented itself. The state Democrats were in such disarray in 1973 that it seemed certain they would be unable to offer a candidate for governor while Henry Howell abandoned their party and ran as an Independent. Former Democratic Governor Mills Godwin agreed to accept the Republican nomination. The Democrats had a strong candidate for attorney general in the incumbent, Andrew Miller, but asked any outstanding candidates for lieutenant governor. The Republican field for the second year was crowded, however, with Dalton the best-known among party members. He easily attracted enough delegate support to win the nomination, and went on to run an upbeat, people-oriented campaign. He defeated the Democratic candidate, Sen. J. Harry Michael of Charlottesville, and a feminist who ran as an Independent.

During his term, Dalton made good on a campaign promise to bring government to the people by holding "open door" meetings across the state. He familiarized himself with the state government machinery and the executive budgetary process he had seen from the other end as a member of the Appropriations Committee. He traveled extensively and became the obvious front-runner for the 1977 Republican nomination for governor.

This was done, however, without the accompaniment of the mass-band hoopla that a more calculating politician might employ. When he was thrust into the spotlight, it was not always in a politically advisable cause. For example, he chose to support Gov. Godwin's calls for a severance tax on coal despite severe political repercussions in Dalton's home 9th District, repercussions inevitably felt well into the gubernatorial campaign.

The result of Dalton's low-key style was that he was not nearly as well known in early 1977 as either of the two prominent Democrats, Miller and Howell. The decision was made to run flat-out from the very start, which was a kickoff luncheon attended by 600 persons and carried by radio to more than 100 gatherings across the state. The mere announcement of the luncheon plans, when only 300 were expected, rattled Miller so badly that he quickly put on a "businessmen's luncheon" in the same hotel ballroom.

Miller especially had to keep looking over his right shoulder as Dalton campaigned aggressively despite the fact he was unopposed for the Republican nomination. Dalton's message in his speeches before the Democratic primary was simple: his supporters should stay out of it.

Only the true-blue, straight-ticket Democrats should vote in the primary, Dalton warned, and the low turnout for the primary election must have been caused at least in part by Dalton's urgings. Nevertheless, Dalton and his helpers had expected to run against Miller, not Howell, and Howell's victory surprised them almost as much as it surprised Miller. The outcome gave Dalton new opportunities he was quick to seize. One was an organization called Virginians for Dalton, which hitherto had existed mostly on paper. It was to be a rallying point for Democrats and Independents who would support Dalton but not necessarily the rest of the Republican ticket. This group had been wary before the primary, but the Howell victory broke the dam and the state was flooded with former Democratic officials and office-holders supporting Dalton.

Other elements of the Dalton coalition included some blacks tired of being taken for granted by the Democratic party, many moderate Democrats unable to abide Howell's style and a huge mass of middle-class voters who saw nothing especially attractive about Howell and much they liked in Dalton. No single group, however, can lay claim to the victory.

That means no one can lay claim to John Dalton. He is on his own. Many people helped, but it was Dalton who made it all come together. With an uncanny instinct, he chose the right people for the right positions and resisted unwise choices or compromises which seemed inevitable to others in the heat of combat. As so often happens in a large organization, frequently he had to make a yes-or-no decision on a matter prepared by others. He trusted the people he himself had chosen and his own inner voice and made the tough decisions. This is not to say that Dalton ran a one-man show. Far from it. He consulted regularly with steering committee made up of prominent Republicans, Independents and former Democrats taking their advice very much into consideration. The political accommodation learned in legislature—no mean thing in plural society—served him well also in running his campaign.

By extension, then, Dalton means it when he says he works closely with his Cabinet. It is the only way he knows how to run an organization as vast as the state government. In the executive office, he must and will rely on others to gather information and prepare options, but there is no doubt that John Dalton will make the ultimate decisions. His experience, empathy with others and a remarkable memory for figures and details will stand him in good stead.

There are likely to be plenty of hard choices to make in the next four years. The fact that the Governor of Virginia cannot succeed himself means that the Governor can make such decisions without keeping an eye cocked on the next campaign. Dalton has said he has no further ambition when the term is over, he will go back to Radford, finish putting his children through school, practice law and tend his cows. The biggest thing he wants to get out of being governor is the satisfaction of a job well done.

used to grin, signaling the next
e. His wit is dry, subtle; but his e always breaks up to give the ne away. "No one runs for Lt.
vernor to make the office a eer."
"But," he added, "I think it uld be presumptuous of me to k about the future when I've t been elected to that office."
During the same press con-eference Robb told the whirring neras: "I am ready to do my t, wherever and whenever I t, to help build the Democratic ty of Virginia." But, again, he added that it would be presumptuous of him to claim a leadership role in the effort.

There was that touch of candor blended carefully with a touch of deference to the political conventions.

Robb had one more stop to make before heading home to his family in McLean. Unescorted and unheralded, he walked into Republican campaign headquarters to meet with Governor-elect John Dalton. He pledged his cooperation for the good of Virginia and came away thinking Dalton

"a straightforward guy."

That was the end of the day after election. But just the beginning for "Chuck" Robb.

Lynda Johnson Robb

Former First Lady, Lady Bird
Johnson has been a frequent companion of her daughter on the campaign trail and has spent much time at the Robb home during the campaign while Lynda and "Chuck" Robb were away, but not surprisingly. "She's always given me a lot of encouragement.
I have a very close relationship with my mother and my sister [Luci, Mrs. Patrick Nugent]. She knew how difficult it was to be away from home and children."

Perhaps it was her own firsthand knowledge of what effects politics can have on family life that colored her reaction when "Chuck" Robb told her he was going to run for office. "I felt surprise, some interest," she recalled. "I've been through politics. I know what it's all about, how difficult it is on the family.
The separations.

"Then I decided if this is what he wants to do, I'll do what I can to help; but it's not what I would have necessarily planned."

But good trouper that she is, she did what she could. Despite avowals that she wouldn't make any speeches, that's what she did.
And despite hopes that she would have more time with the children, it soon became evident that when
"we need somebody in Covington" and there was no one to send, the decision was "send Lynda." She enjoyed the campaigning, meeting the people and seeing the various parts of the state. But then there are other times—"the long hours. You're tired and you get somewhere and you've been on your feet 12 hours. What you really want to do is go to bed, but there are people to meet."

Where will the next few months lead? She knows that she hopes her husband will be able to get home on weekends from the General Assembly sessions, that she will spend some time in Richmond, that the children will remain enrolled in school near their home, that her work with Ladies Home Journal and RIF will continue. She also will continue to meet her civic responsibilities, such as serving on a jury, a task that fell her lot for the first time in late November.

One thing is very evident in talking with Lynda Robb. She has her life well under control and enjoys mutual respect and supportiveness with her husband.
"Throughout our marriage I've tried to keep a job and expected him to realize I wouldn't always be home." "Chuck" Robb has encouraged her in her interests and work and so, too, was she his chief supporter when he tackled each new challenge in his career.

And if all goes well, as the busy holiday season fades into inauguration and General Assembly duties, Lynda Robb just may find time to read Alistair Cooke's book, "America," which she bought and tucked away for herself for Christmas.

The First Shall Be First . . .

fiction. In fact, although nearly all of his scenes are physically well placed, the novel is essentially concerned with the mental reactions of the characters and particularly the reflections of the protagonist, Daniel Martin.

Since I am obviously not trying to promote this novel, I'd like to indicate some of Martin's reflections which impressed me. On leaving Hollywood, for a forced return to England, Martin thinks:

"The American myth is of free will in its simple, primary sense. One can choose oneself and will oneself; and this absurdly optimistic assumption so dominates the republic that it has bred all its gross social inequalities. Failure to succeed proves a moral, not a genetic, fault. . . .

"The myth becomes so pervasive that it even ends up as the credo of those, the underprivileged, who most need to disbelieve it. I have seen it in even the most intelligent liberals, people . . . impeccably sympathetic in their attitude to things like Medicare, Black Anger, environmental control and all the rest; yet still they hanker after the old and other American dream of freedom to cash in on other people's inequality. From the beginning Americans came to America to escape two things: political tyranny and fixed odds in the struggle for life, and they have never realized that the two aims are profoundly hostile to each other—that the genetic injustice of life is just as great as the old European economic injustice . . ."

One of the novel's appeals to me is its skillful weaving from present back to various eras shared by the characters. In referring to the 1951 Festival of Britain, Martin thinks it "was not at all the herald of a new age, but the death-knell of an old one. We then broke up into tribes and classes, finally into private selves."

I felt this was equally true of America, with its ethnics and pressure groups, its power blocs and admired wheeler-dealers obviously out for themselves. Also applicable to America is his line: "We [in-turned selves] failed to see what was really happening; and just as we also failed to evolve new political parties to meet the need—and the danger—of an increasingly self-centered society, so also we lacked the honesty to throw away the old masks . . ."

As one who partly shares his disenchantment with a communications industry which has contributed its part to blocking "a conduit between national reality and national awareness of it," I think Fowles is only a little too strong in writing, "of a vision of clogging spew of pundits and pontificators, editors and interviewers, critics and columnists, puppet personalities and attitude hucksters, a combined media Mafia squatting on an enormous dungheap of empty words and tired images, and conjoined, despite their private rivalries and jealousies, by one common determination: to retain their own status and importance in the system they had erected."

On motion pictures and television specifically, he voices a plaint many must feel. "All art is a surrogate for the individual imaginations of an audience; but these two are beyond that role now, and into that of usurpation. They sap and leach the national power away; insidiously impose their own conformities . . . their limitations; deny the existence of what they cannot capture." It is this last limitation which makes both the tube and picture manipulate persons, especially young and uneducated, with their whose relation to life is grotesque whether in so-called comedies or war passes for "drama."

These few illustrations taken from Daniel Martin are superficial and out of context. Fowles is at his best and most thought-provoking where he takes off from such mundane samples, these and develops philosophical flights on the character of the two countries, the character of modern man, and most of all, on the character of men and women in love, and on kinds of love. But these passages are too tightly woven to permit of small extracts.

In the sense of a leisurely treatment of character, Daniel Martin might be regarded as a return to the tradition of the English novel. But his technique, which could scarcely be regarded as experimental or even advanced among today's favored novels, is a masterly use of the strata of time which is largely a 20th century development.

On the twentieth century, Fowles offers an interesting observation: "It feels that it began in 1945. I don't think he'll find too much agreement there but, except in a chronological sense, it certainly did not start in 1901 or 1901. My guess would be that character of the nineteenth century sisted, or lingered, until around the of World War I—say 1919.

While the 'twenties were certainly a ak with the past, while the White use was occupied by the like of rding, Coolidge, and Hoover, and itical machines like Tammany in w York continued their 19th cen-y ways and sway, the 'twenties do seem the jumping-off place into a y century. It might be World War following the Great Depression, ich began the 20th century.

However, whenever one feels the h century began, we are in it now, better or worse and, as Mr. Fowles
s, too much in both countries shies ay from grappling with or even facthe problems and the dangers that distinctly new. The in-turned selves d self-centered non-persons are ift in a moral void where there is, course, no place for the life of the man spirit. The motto, or epitaph, of s 20th century is: "The exploiters there first with the most exploit-e."

Double up, America.

When people carpool, companies benefit directly, because, obviously, fewer cars will make less demand on the parking spaces in the company lot.
And some companies have attributed an increase in punctuality to the fact that more and more of their employees were carpooling.
