We tried to find a positive review of London's new Olympic stadium (we really did), but alas: we couldn't resist Glancey x 3 (including narrated video). — Dyckhoff asks "where's the architecture?" (and whatever happened to Foreign Office Architects aesthetic vision?) — Baillieu wonders what happened to Peter Cook. — Look! We found one: the stadium "harks back to the grandeur of ancient Rome" (but then Bayley weighs in). — A British think tank says £30 billion hasn't had an impact on urban regeneration (of course, the government totally rejects the claim). — de Portzamparc: picked for museum in Hollywood. — Orlando arts district set for major facelift. — Orlando finalizes design team for new performing arts center. — A multi-billion-dollar mega-resort heading for Atlantic City will be a "a large series of 'wows.'" — Canadian security expert suggests that government agencies and industry leaders establish two-way sharing of information. — BBC international poll finds most people are ready for "green" sacrifices. — Piano goes fishing (mentally), and shows us his list of wonders of the world. — Three case studies of anti-suburbanites in NYC, LA, and London. — Metropolis brings us Live@Greenbuild. — Calls for entries: EOI for Waterloo City Square in London, and Integrating Habitats in Oregon.

Long on legacy, short on wow: "This is a very simple building," said Rod Sheard, architect in charge of the design of the London 2012 Olympic stadium. And, I must say, it's hard to disagree...safe, sensible and pragmatic design has clearly been driven by the dreaded "L" word...but, matter-of-fact and just a little mousey, this will certainly be no white elephant. By Jonathan Glancey - HOK Sport - Guardian (UK)

Will the Olympic stadium have a life after the games? Politicians are haunted by the white-elephant experience of the Dome as the final design for the Olympics arena is revealed. So what will be it's legacy to the nation post 2012? Legacy-per-hour, or LPH, is the new scientific measurement (oh, all right, I've just made it up)... Plain and practical is the aim as London unveils its 2012 stadium: Jonathan Glancey's take on promotional video [video]- Guardian (UK)

Olympic stadium is deflated architecture at an inflated price: ...main stadium is meant to be the showstopping jewel in the Olympics' crown, not something from Kesa fit for a garden party. Where's the pizzazz? Where's the showbiz? Where's the architecture. Tessa? By Tom Dyckhoff - HOK Sport - The Times (UK)

2012 Olympic stadium design disappoints on all fronts: Rather than being innovative and ground breaking, as claimed by the ODA, HOK's newly-unveiled stadium is unsustainable and poor value for money, while all we hoped Peter Cook's involvement might have lent a certain je ne sais quoi, his presence seems to have been non-existent. By Amanda Baillieu - BD/Building Design (UK)

A Colossus Olympic stadium: London's stunning 2012 Olympic stadium harks back to the grandeur of ancient Rome..."Architects may hate it but everyone else should welcome the world's most environmental stadium."..."The stadium is the work of a big American commercial architecture firm who called in Peter Cook, an antique local modernist, to add design credibility" (Stephen Bayley) - Mirror (UK)

£30bn 'did little to boost towns':...spent on regeneration schemes in UK towns and cities over the past 10 years has had no real impact, a centre-right think tank [Policy Exchange] has claimed... Local Government Minister John Healey said: "We totally reject these claims..." - BBC News
