- Heathcote offers a fascinating overview of how cities in crisis are using “urban ingenuity” where “innovative, often surprising initiatives may hold clues to ways of change.”
- Jaffe takes a look at how things are coming along at some of the most touted “cities of the future” - and when/if they might actually arrive.
- Genevino and Wade introduce “The Five Thousand Pound Life,” the Arch League’s ambitious new initiative “to raise our collective discussion of living sustainably to a higher register.”
- Taylor-Hochberg looks into “the impact and responsibility of contemporary architectural design,” and why “architects and clients must empathize with the users of their projects.”
- Brake explores NYC’s new Hunter’s Point South Park and finds it “a good example of when Bloomberg's integrated approach to architecture, landscape, real estate development, and public services actually lived up to his vision.”
- Baillie calls on RIBA “to drop the theorizing”: Hodder wants “to find hard evidence” of the value of good design, but “why waste time on something that is likely to languish in ministers’ bottom drawers - if indeed it ever gets that far?”
- In Melbourne, two proposed towers draw some towering concerns while their architects cheer on their designs.
- Why the Flinders Street Station may never be built that “has led to claims that the competition was a waste of money,” and “should not have been initiated if there was no certainty of construction.”
- Seoul has soaring plans for an “invisible” tower that will include a roller coaster, water park, and lots of leisure stuff (an invisible tower near the airport?!?!?).
- Brussat broils over the “latest news in bad-boy buildings.”
- Some truly inspiring projects make the shortlist in the ICSID’S World Design Impact Prize 2013-2014.
- An impressive list of winners in the 2013 Toronto Urban Design Awards.
- Five make the final cut in the Nordic Built Challenge.
- An interesting take on “how Gothic architecture took over the American college campus: Colleges look medieval partly because of envy, industrialism, and ... racism” (sure to spark some comments!).
- Why the Flinders Street Station may never be built that “has led to claims that the competition was a waste of money,” and “should not have been initiated if there was no certainty of construction.”

- Crisis-stricken cities can fight back with ingenious solutions: “...cities can be volatile...Yet growth brings its own problems...Perhaps it is precisely in these kinds of crises that urban ingenuity has the opportunity to emerge and have a real effect...innovative, often surprising initiatives may hold clues to ways of change. By Edwin Heathcote - Financial Times [UK]
- The Five Thousand Pound Life: The Architectural League announces an ambitious initiative to raise our collective discussion of living sustainably to a higher register, imagining the systemic change needed to live well, and to live well within the carrying capacity of the planet. By Rosalie Genevino and Andrew Wade - Urban Omnibus
- AfterShock #1: Architectural Consumers in the Experience Economy: “…the impact and responsibility of contemporary architectural design...Architects and clients must empathize with the users of their projects...when considering the “generic” user, how does one relate to the architectural art form, and how should those creating architecture understand that relation? By Amelia Taylor-Hochberg - Archinect
- It’s time for the RIBA to drop the theorising and move on: Angela Brady was a good president, but it’s time the institute danced to a different tune: Stephen Hodder...wants the RIBA to find hard evidence that good design brings economic value, improves performance, and even engenders a sense of community...why waste time on something that is likely to languish in ministers’ bottom drawers – if indeed it ever gets that far? By Amanda Baillie - BDBuilding Design (UK)
- The tower that’s dividing Melbourne: Its creators have labelled it an “elegant” urban icon, but a damning Melbourne City Council report has warned a new 72-storey apartment building would oppress and stifle the neighbours...conclusions have refused to promise funding for the design...This has led to claims that the competition was a “waste of money”, and that it should not have been initiated if there was no certainty of construction. - Herzog & de Meuron + HASSELL’s Flinders Street Station [in Melbourne] may never be built: State Government has of yet, refused to promise funding for the design...This has led to claims that the competition was a “waste of money”, and that it should not have been initiated if there was no certainty of construction. [images] - Architecture & Design [Australia]
- The latest news in bad-boy buildings...: what doesn't wash out in the laundry list of modern architecture's flaws are its most basic attributes. [Its] overheated need for novelty breeds over-dependence on engineers, undermines the possibility of civilized urbanism and generates derisive monikers from the public...”Wow” is the new beautiful. By David Brussat - Providence Journal (Rhode Island)
