- Wigglesworth issues an eloquent rallying cry for "the profession to stop kowtowing to clients and start setting the political agenda: We need to lead the resistance against the privatization of public space, the poorly planned, the cheap and the undersized."
- Flint reports on a major new report about the mega-project, perhaps too often considered "the white elephant, the boondoggle, never on time, always over budget - maybe we're not judging them on the right criteria."
- Q&A with one of the authors of the mega-project report: "Don't go along with the myths, or whims of politicians who have a gut feeling."
- Speaking of mega-projects, Betsky bemoans the rebuilt World Trade Center as "boring": "we are building forgettable structures"...renamed One World Trade Center...might have been elegant, but a combination of value engineering and paranoia about terrorism attacks..."false history." That got my dander up, even more than their refusal to see the plain common sense of replacing, at last, the ugly tent and portajohns with a modest and lovely welcome center.

Are Mega-Projects Really As Bad As Everyone Says? It's hard to build anything ambitious these days without being second-guessed. But maybe we're not judging them on the right criteria: Are we building forgettable structures? Did we lose the chance to build something special in the first place? By James S. Russell -- NBBJ; Callison; LMN Architects [images]

Looking at transit success and failure: Q&A: Harry Dimitriou/Omega Centre, Bartlett School of Planning [re: mega-projects]: "My first point is how little we learn from the lessons of the past. We need to pick up lessons that matter. Don't go along with the myths, or whims of politicians who have a gut feeling." [Globe and Mail (Canada)]

Power to the architects: Sarah Wigglesworth calls on the profession to stop kowtowing to clients and start setting the political agenda: Our leadership skills are weak and we have failed to bring the public with us in arguing for investment in the environment that matters...We need to lead the resistance against the privatization of public space, the poorly planned, the cheap and the undersized. - DB/Building Design (UK)

A fresh vision for Lake Shore East: Imagine the possibilities if the deteriorating Gardiner Expressway was brought down to earth...restoring the sunlight to Lake Shore Blvd.: Rather than repeat past failures, we must seize the huge potential...That will require a boldness that doesn't come easily in usually timid Toronto...Yet, in a world where cities must compete...there's no option but urban excellence. By Christopher Hume - Toronto Star

How Did the Rebuilt World Trade Center Become Boring? To commemorate a nation's strength and resilience, we are building forgettable structures: Freedom Tower...renamed One World Trade Center...might have been elegant, but a combination of value engineering and paranoia about terrorism attacks...leached just about anything elegant out of the structure. Amazon Towers, Paul Allen's Geek Zone Cursed by Duniness: Three glass domes set to rise like cartoon icon bubbles can't save Amazon.com's new Seattle headquarters from terminal dullness: Does this mediocrity matter? Seattle is a creative-class capital...Why must architecture go missing?...To show the world that...we are building forgettable structures. By David Brusget -- Richard Morris Hunt (1895): Alan Joslin/Epstein Joslin Architects [images] - Providence Journal (Rhode Island)

Illinois State Capitol rehab worth every penny: Restoration of west wing to its original grandeur ensures a people's house for centuries to come: ...there is an undeniable tension between the Capitol's trans-cendent beauty and the state's troubled budget...raises the larger issue of what we expect from our public buildings...a shining example of seamlessly combining the practical and the aesthetic. By Blair Kamin -- Alfred Henry Pequeno (1868); J. Richard Alspach & Henneman Engineering; Vinci Hamp Architects; EverGreene Architectural Arts [images] - Chicago Tribune

A fight over "false history" in Newport: ...proposed welcome center for The Breakers...with its tiny footprint and modest yet elegant design...has been rejected...false history..."That got my dander up, even more than their refusal to see the plain common sense of replacing, at last, the ugly tent and portajohns with a modest and lovely welcome center. By David Brusset -- Richard Morris Hunt (1895): Alan Joslin/Epstein Joslin Architects [images] - Providence Journal (Rhode Island)

Lisbon Architecture Triennale: Close, but not close enough: Close, Closer's mix of spectacle and social radicalism does not entirely convince: ...has the feeling of an institution in search of an identity...I am still at a loss as to what the city's ambitions are in throwing such a jamboree and who the intended audience might be. By Ellis Woodman -- Beatrice Galliée [images] - BD/Building Design (UK)
Zoom in or zone out? Close. Closer: the Lisbon Architecture Triennale is low on building count and high on story-telling, performance and socially engaged practice: ...the curatorial hand lies quite heavy at times...can come across as an intellectual exercise that is an end in itself, with the engagement of any “publics” rather buried under all the rhetoric...I did start to rue the lack of a bit of built-stuff as ballast...By Rob Wilson -- Beatrice Galilee [images] - Uncube magazine (Germany)
