• Boston Proud: as the Boston Marathon kicks off today, we cheer the collaboration of building professionals bringing "accessible design into the homes of those injured in last year's attack."

• Quirk takes a long, thoughtful look at what might be in store for Chile's cultural capital that was recently "brought to its knees by vicious forest fires"; government proposals don't quite cut it, but it's "a country with 3,500 architecture students that produces 1,400 architects a year, and 12,500 victims have been left without homes. Together, surely innovative solutions can be thought up and executed" (look at Medellín, Colombia).

• Marshall minces no words about the upside of tearing down inner-city highways, but "what is needed is a game plan for doing it, and a coherent vision of the city that will emerge in their absence."

• Lamster laments that "ad hocism reigns" in Dallas, "a city of grand ambition," but no "guiding vision that unites these sometimes conflicting plans - our plans are at once too susceptible to meddling, yet somehow inflexible in the face of changing priorities."

• Hough on why it's so hard for the "coveted creative class" to find "neighborhoods with lots of character": "Maybe it is because we are trying too hard. We all know the broken window theory, but need to stop overcompensating against it all the time."

• Simon on why "even the most practically engineered buildings need to be endearing" if they're to endure.

• Betsky is hard-pressed to find anything good to say about Piano's new Whitney Museum: it's "big, boxy, and boring. Is there any hope? I can only hope for interior redemption:"

• Kennedy on the critical cries against MoMA's expansion plans - and its director: "There are a number of us...who don't want to see the museum become a mere entertainment center," says Agnes Gund.

• Koloson Hurley reports on Walmart's "sharp departure from its usual formula" by scaling down and building residential up in a Washington, D.C. neighborhood.

• Chicago's mayor gives marching orders to civic leaders: "Find spot for the George Lucas museum" - serious efforts to ensue.

• Eyefuls of the eight impressive shortlisted teams in the running for the UK's Milan Expo 2015 pavilion (can you match names to designs?).

• Making the case: Why revamping Public Square in downtown Cleveland would be a wise investment: Critics of the $30 million proposal...argue that revamping the square would be a foolish waste in a struggling city with more urgent needs. On the contrary, the history of great cities...shows that high quality public space is necessary to the revival of any urban neighborhood - and that the economic payoff is often significant. • Finding Authenticity: The coveted creative class is in search of neighborhoods and communities with lots of character. Why are such places so hard to find? Maybe it is because we are trying too hard...We all know the broken window theory, but need to stop overcompensating against it all the time. By Mark Hough - PLANetizen

• Timeless Buildings Must Speak To Users: The current attention to sustainability too often ignores the need for structures that our great grandchildren will love 100 years out, while still practical and flexible enough for inevitable changes...To endure, even the most practically engineered buildings need to be endearing...The way we make buildings should carry messages to inhabitants long into the future, hopefully: "I care for you, so please care for me." By Mark Simon/Centerbrook Architects - Hartford Courant (Connecticut)

• The New Whitney Museum: Big, Boxy, Bad: And boring. Is there any hope? The boxy, dull, and unsophisticated exterior...is unfitting of the museum's ambitions...I am hard pressed to say anything about it other than that it is big, badly proportioned, unrevealing of anything on the inside, and dull in its appearance...I can only hope for interior redemption when the structure opens next year. By Aaron Betsky -- Renzo Piano [images]- Architect Magazine

• MoMA's Expansion and Director Draw Critics: The Museum of Modern Art's latest expansion has sharpened complaints from art critics, artists, architects and patrons about the museum's direction and its director, Glenn D. Lowry...complaints...that it has grown too fast and lost much of its soul in courting the crowd..."There are a number of us...who don't want to see the museum become a mere entertainment center"...By Randy Kennedy - New York Times

• Harmony over planned riverside high-rise: Usually when neighbors and developers lock horns over a project design, things turn ugly and stay ugly. There's a happier ending for One Riverside...on the Schuylkill next to the popular riverfront trail...the big surprise isn't just that the new version is superior; it's that both sides enthusiastically agree it's better. By Inga Saffron –

Walmart Scales Down and Branches Out: Fort Totten Square in Washington, D.C., designed by Hickok Cole Architects, is a sharp departure from the retailer's usual formula...placing 345 residential units above...four stories of apartments will wrap around two large courtyards, one with a swimming pool. By Amanda Kolson Hurley [slide show] - Architectural Record

Mayor Rahm Emanuel to Chicago civic leaders: Find spot for George Lucas museum: San Francisco is still in the running after offering an alternative, less desirable site. So are other cities..."I wouldn't be doing this if I thought we were being used...This is a real effort. The city is serious. He's serious. And the task force is serious." - Chicago Sun-Times

Arcbazar - Architectural Design Competitions: ...it's an intriguing way for clients to get ideas for projects they are considering from trained designers...Is Arcbazar for everyone who is seeking design services? I think not...But for those seeking designs for projects that aren't too complicated and are looking for a myriad of ideas and possible solutions, I think it is a great resource. By Kriss Pettersen [images] - Entablature

The SCADpad: Affordable Housing Inserted Into Aging Parking Decks: "We've cracked open a new discourse on adaptive reuse, and a model for a new strategy":...Which means that, like the 19th century warehouse, the mid-century modern parking deck could be transformed soon into the trendiest loft space of the 21st century. By J. Michael Welton -- Savannah College of Art and Design - Huffington Post

Architects Remember the 1964-65 World's Fair: 50 years ago, designers-to-be were inspired by architecture's possibilities when they saw the fantastical pavilions in Queens, New York...the fantasies of the fair came back with a vengeance in the "starchitect" era of the 1990s and early 2000s, when technology caught up to the vision. By Fred A. Bernstein – Philip
