How to Please a Man
Ingenious ideas on decorating, comfort, storage, entertaining

A Man's Cook Book
All you do is guide it. Roasts? No tiresome sawing . . . the reciprocating blades do all the work. Simply press the switch and guide the knife on your hot or cold roast beef. Carve thick slices for hearty dinners, slice wafer-thin (without shredding!) for party sandwiches. The blades stop instantly when you release the switch.

All you do is guide it. Turkey? See how it travels in and around joints smoothly, so swiftly, so effortlessly! You carve like a professional, even on the most difficult carving jobs. (Roast lamb, for example, as well as poultry.) The blades stay sharp, too. They're tarnish-resistant stain steel with tough, tungsten-carbide cutting edges.

All you do is guide it. Assorted foods? Buy cold cuts by the chunk and slice them as needed. (They stay fresh longer.) Slice bread, rolls, cake; soft foods, like ripe tomatoes; harder foods, like frozen ice cream or fresh pineapple. There's no end to the daily uses of General Electric's new Electric Slicing Knife!

Free introductory offer. All you do is guide it. See that beautiful, all-stainless-steel Carving Fork? It makes a very handsome and useful companion piece to General Electric's new Electric Slicing Knife. And it's yours free when you purchase the knife. (Available at participating dealers only.) But hurry, please. He has limited quantities only.
How you can prevent these heating or cooling problems in your new home
(or correct them in your existing home)

What good is the world's most expensive home if it isn't comfortable to live in?

One of the best investments you can make in your new home or your present one is to take a little time and spend a little extra on insuring your comfort—with adequate heating or cooling.

This means Zone Control—dividing your home into two or more areas that you can keep at different temperatures to suit your family's needs.

Zoning is simple! In a forced air system, for example, all you need are a separate thermostat for each zone along with a damper and damper motor to control the air distribution. In hot water systems, you need thermostats and zone valves to control hot water flow. In some cases, two small furnaces or boilers are used. Installations are made quickly and easily.

How you can zone your home. The first step is to decide how you want to divide your home, by zones. Then call your heating or plumbing contractor. Be sure he understands you want to zone and where. He can design a system that will assure you the comfort you need and deserve.

In a new home, he'll lay out a piping or duct system for each zone. If he can do this at the planning stage, you can have Zone Control for very little extra cost. In your present home, it may be as simple as adding a thermostat with its associated controls.

For more information on Zone Control, write for free literature. And, now available to help you in your planning, an informative 48 page booklet "How to get the most out of your heating and cooling dollar"—50¢ postage paid. Write Honeywell, Dept. HG7-49, Minneapolis 8, Minnesota

Notes for the Hostess

By Diana Bryan

Helpful hints on how a good wife can assure that her man will enjoy playing host in his own castle: When he's expected to carve a roast, be sure the carving knives are as sharp as scalpelts, that he can see what he's carving, that he has plenty of elbow room and that he's not handicapped by a too-small platter. During the outdoor season, keep his barbecue equipment spotless, and stock plenty of charcoal always on hand, along with tinder or lighter to start it with. When he's bartender, keep a plentiful supply of ice at his elbow, plus soda, soft drinks, lemons, olives and the like, and—most important—a varied stock of liquor. (Nothing irritates a man more than to offer a guest something only to find that there isn't any on hand.) Also, the corkscrew must function and the ice crusher crush. Adequate, ample and available are the three A's I try to bear in mind when setting the scene of a party.

Don recently was host to a group of his fishing friends to celebrate—and share—his catch of a really mammoth salmon. Somehow, although he put up a great masculine front, the honor of cooking this fish fell to me. I took one look at it and went out to find something to cook it in. Luckily I was able to buy a fish poacher that measures 90 centimeters long (almost a yard). This tin-plated mammoth poacher was a marvelous carving platter—its wieldiness and its portability, its quantity, its capacity for easy carving, and the four portions, its wieldiness and its simple good looks. The spikes are well placed to hold a roast firmly for easy carving, and the four wells are big enough for serving man-sized portions of vegetables.

This new, smart bath scale has 3-way convenience. Lies flat for weighing. Then, stands up to save space. Or, use the handle to move it anywhere. Gigantic easy-read Dial—smooth vinyl mat—flat platform, no dial bulge—300 lb. capacity. Beautiful and dependable—a Borg! Chrome, $12.75*—enamel, $10.45*, at leading stores. No other scale is made like a Borg.

Somehow the preponderance of magazine pictures of pretty guest rooms gives the impression that only women are ever guests. Actually, at our house we seem to have more male overnight guests than female, since so many of Don's professional and informal friends stay with us when they're in town. So I keep the guest bath always stocked with large cakes of soap, big bath towels and shaving equipment. I also have equipped the guest room with a wooden valet to hang a suit on, and an ample desk and working lamp for the man guest who has to get in a few licks of paper work.

Sara Bennett and I were both flattered and surprised when our husbands' all-male golf club asked us to help them find party equipment for their newly organized dining quarters. They had already ordered china and silver, and the kitchen had been professionally designed and equipped. What the men wanted from us was more or less what might be called the finishing touches. What a glorious excuse it was for us to go on a buying spree. The prize of all our purchases was a marvelous carving platter of Chichester-stainless steel with staghorn handles and measuring 33 by 17 inches, capacious enough to hold an impressive roast of beef, a suckling pig or king-sized turkey. It was made by Cardel, Ltd., a company that has been in business in England since the fifteenth century. But it wasn't the platter's lineage that impressed Sara and me so much as its proportions, its wieldiness and its simple good looks. The spikes are well placed to hold a roast firmly for easy carving, and the four wells are big enough for serving man-sized portions of vegetables.
What's new, cools you, and doesn't look like an air conditioner?

Clue: it’s in the window above... it’s a bright new idea from Westinghouse. Now you don't have to spoil a pretty window with a piece of machinery. Your Westinghouse Dealer has the first “furniture-designed” line of air conditioners ever made.

If your room is Traditional, choose the cabinet above. If you go for Early American, Provincial or Contemporary, there's a fine, hand-crafted cabinet to match. Just take your pick.

Inside these handsome hardwood cabinets is the most efficient cooling instrument we've ever engineered. From 10 feet... 20 feet... even 30 feet away you can feel its cooling comfort. It gently spreads cooled, dried, filtered air to the farthest corner of the largest room. Yet this powerful instrument is as quiet as a purring kitten. A few feet away you can barely hear it.

Only your Westinghouse Dealer sells cooling power plus beauty. See the world's first “furniture-designed” air conditioners soon.

We never forget how much you rely on Westinghouse
End of another great train: Lucius Beebe lovingly describes the romantic Overland Limited, shown in her days of glory, double-heading through Colfax in the High Sierra.

What lay beyond the looming Rockies? Before other pioneers, tough Jedediah Smith probed the deserts and mapped huge unknown areas.

John Paul Jones beats the British, 1779: "What d----d rascals are they?" Jones bellowed above the battle as crewmen moved to strike his battered flag. "Shoot them!"

"The country of America. This is called a balloon." So the Japanese artist gravely described this century-old water color view. He was drawing for his own people, suddenly interested in the United States, which had just opened Japan to the world. His information was second-hand, but his America is no stranger than the Japan of our opera and musical comedy. The view is part of a sixteen-page color portfolio.
Armageddon revisited: Laurence Stallings, co-author of What Price Glory?, describes a battle in which he fought and was grievously wounded — bloody Belleau Wood. Here, for 19 days in June, 1918, U.S. troops took on the best Germany had to offer — and, at terrible cost, won.

An historic friendship breaks up: Through World War I, Col. Edward House was Woodrow Wilson's alter ego. Abruptly, something came between them. Just before he died, House confided who and what it was to Yale's ex-President Charles Seymour, who reveals the strange story for the first time here.

An Innovation: Hard Covers, No Ads
AMERICAN HERITAGE is something utterly new, a magazine designed to put the American story into a form and idiom that fit our times: fast-paced, colorful, dramatic, authoritative. The writers, beginning with Senior Editor Bruce Catton, include the best historians of our day.

Add to that 100 or more authentic, from-the-period illustrations in every issue (a third in fine color); handsome typography on two quality papers; and no advertising pages at all. Put all this between beautiful hard covers, like a fine book, and issue six each year — one every other month. And that's AMERICAN HERITAGE — as different from other magazines as Americans are from other people.

Buy 3 — Get 6
Obviously, all this just doesn't turn up as a free sample; AMERICAN HERITAGE is $3.95 for a single copy, and well worth the tab. Nor is it the kind of thing that's left on tram seats. Over 96% of our 300,000-plus subscribers save every issue, because these magazines never go out of date. They soon form a handsome, growing history collection.

Here's the way our get-acquainted offer works: after your first issue arrives, pay $3.95; then, each month for the next two, send an additional $3.95. These three payments cover the retail cost of three issues. After the first three issues, you'll get three more — but no more bills. You will own six issues for the price of three — i.e., for half what you'd pay if you bought all six singly.

We know AMERICAN HERITAGE is its own best salesman. May we show you? Mail the card inserted here at once, and you'll start with the latest issue, and the stories you see illustrated. If the card is gone, write to AMERICAN HERITAGE Subscription Office, 383 West Center Street, Marion, Ohio.

AMERICAN HOODED CRADLE

This cradle was purchased as an antique. I would like to know if you can tell me its approximate age and probable origin.

R. P.—Mamaroneck, N.Y.

It is an American hooded cradle and might date as early as 1760 or as late as 1820. If it is made of maple or some other soft wood, it was probably the work of a country cabinetmaker. It appears to be a New England piece.

IRON BOX STOVE

My wood-burning stove has the name Jefferson Furnace across the top. Where was Jefferson Furnace and how old is the stove?

L. R., Jr.—Richwood, N. J.

Jefferson Furnace was an iron foundry specializing in stoves at Jefferson, N. J. Your stove is typical of those made between 1820 and 1835.

I have five dessert dishes bearing this mark. Can you tell me their age and what the 1755 in the mark means?

Your dishes were made at the porcelain factory of F. A. Mehlem, Bonn, Germany, after 1891. The date 1755 was the year porcelain was first made at Bonn.

These heavy brass candelabra are marked Barbédienne, Paris, 1800. Is Barbédienne the name of the designer?

E. S.—Walla Walla, Wash.

Yes, Barbédienne was a well-known Parisian maker of fine brass ornaments about 1890-1890. His work won him various medals and the Legion of Honor.

Could you tell me when and by whom this mahogany bed was made? I recently bought it at an antique shop.

Your bed is late American Empire or very early Victorian. It was probably made to order by an excellent cabinetmaker. Tall post beds of this type were commonly used in southern plantation mansions about 1835-1850.

These nodding head figurines are English. Can you trace their origin more specifically? B. C. L.—Woodbury, N. J.

They were made by some Staffordshire pottery between 1830 and 1850. Being unmarked, they cannot be traced further.

We would appreciate any information about this hand-carved teakwood chest which we purchased two years ago.

E. J. S.—Old Tappan, N. Y.

This is a Chinese side-wall cabinet made by a native craftsman probably in a seaport city during the second half of the nineteenth century. Such cabinets were used to display jade, ivory, lacquered objects.

What sort of jug is this? It is marked "From Park & Tilford, Grocers, 921-923 Broadway, N. Y." L. P.—Baldwin, N. Y.

It is a stoneware whiskey jug dating between 1865 and 1890 when Park & Tilford was the quality grocery of New York City.

Enclosed with the snapshot of my English bracket clock is a facsimile of the name engraved on the face and on the back plate of the works. Can you date this clock?

Samuel Atkins (1697–1768) was an eminent London watch and clockmaker. He worked at his trade about 1733-1765. His bracket clocks, such as this one, are well known to collectors.

Steep cobbled streets on the south bank will lead you into the old city, where the print and antique shops smack of Left-bank Paris. If you make part of the tour by train, cut your haste, you can cover the French, German and Italian regions, each nation, Tor lis are scarce— and extremely independent.

The very neutrality of Switzerland’s background, however, has germinated and housed, over the past century and a half, a diverse and colorful collection of people. Although Lenin left it in a sealed train, without comment, Zurich was, to James Joyce, second only to Dublin as a city of intellectual stimulus. He lived there in the late Nineteen-Thirties, at the same time that Einstein, Jung and Stravinsky, Paul Klee, one of whose early exhibitions was refused by the local council, nevertheless dwelt happily enough just outside Locarno. Dickens revealed in Lausanne, and Madame de Staël summed with her personal entourage at Rolle. Wagner divided his time between Lucerne and a private island on Lake Zurich. Byron complained poetically in a villa on the shores of Lake Geneva (it now belongs to a Swiss plastics millionaire). Stendhal and Flaubert both traveled the country widely, but the latter echoed the thoughts of many when he said of the Alpine landscape: “I would give all the glories for the Vatican museum. . . the Alps are too big to be any use to us.”

Certainly the beauty of Switzerland’s landscape, like a wood full of bluebells in the spring, is so spectacular as to seem at times almost banal. The view from the mountain slope, accompanied by the clanging of bells borne by innocent, fudge-colored cows, is pure sensation, even further enhanced by the light and height, the smell of the air. It can be enjoyed to the point of ecstasy but never reproduced, for its elements derive from too many different senses.

One of the chief charms of Switzerland for the time-bedeviled vacationer is its cozy compactness. In two or three weeks, without haste, you can cover the French, German and Italian regions, each with its distinctive architecture and ambiance, and sample at leisure the cities, the mountain resorts and the lakeside towns with their varied delights. (If you make part of the tour by train, cut your luggage to a minimum and forward the bulk to your next destination. Porters are scarce—and extremely independent.)

Start with Geneva

A perfect place to start is cosmopolitan Geneva, a city built on water rather in the manner of Stockholm, with a sheer, euphetic sense of well-being. Debouching from the lake on which the city lies like a sickle moon, the Rhône flows through Geneva in a moving staircase of water, pouring swiftly and inexorably over the weirs. The buildings that line the waterfronts are visions of nineteenth-century propriety and solidarity, but a few paces up the steep cobbled streets on the south bank will take you into the old city, where the print and antique shops smack of Left-bank Paris. The Place du Bourg, with its delightful flower-decked fountain, is the landmark of this vieille ville. The streets house expensive antique shops, browse-worthy junk shops, one or two galleries that show contemporary painting and delightful restaurants.

The famous fondues

Haunts of the young and chic are the Orangerie, the Chandelier and the Café des Armaures. The oldest and most traditional is the Café du Palais de Justice, an erstwhile bistro that was the hangout of inter-war politicians. It is here, too, that you will get the best fondue. The advantages of fondue for informal entertaining need hardly be stressed. What is better than a bowl of creamy, kirsch-scented cheese kept warm over a slow spirit stove for guests to dip into with pieces of crusty bread? If you should want to serve it at home, there is an imported package Swiss-made fondue that can hardly be improved upon. Serve it with liberal quantities of dry white wine—in Switzerland, always the wine of the Valais, Fendant.

Another type of Swiss fondue is the meat variety, fondue Bourguignonne. This consists of small cubes of raw steak splayed on long forks and cooked in a pan full of hot oil. The flavor is in the accompanying dips: horseradish sauce, or chopped onions lightly bound with olive oil; mayonnaise laced with chopped pimientos and a drop of chili sauce; and at least two kinds of mustard, one sharp and one sweet. You can buy special long ebony-handled fondue forks at any hardware store or gift shop in Switzerland and, if weight is no problem, you might buy a cheese fondue set complete with six small plates and a heatproof porcelain cooking dish.

Some of the best Swiss international food, biased toward the French, you will find in Geneva’s great hotel restaurants: the Bergues, the Richemond and the Beau-Rivage—also at the Auberge à la Mère Royaume, a rustic looking restaurant of great repute. Geneva is encircled on three sides by French territory. Driving around the northern, Swiss shore of the lake, you encounter first Lausanne of the finishing schools, then Montreux, a sort of Monte Carlo of hotels and casino, which was built for and enjoyed by the generations between 1870 and 1914. One notable restaurant between the two cities is that of the Hotel du Monde at Grandvaux, high up on the corniche road. I noted there the addition of a touch of curry powder to the salad dressing, also a particularly good dessert: peeled sliced oranges and finely shredded orange peel, soaked in syrup with a dash of absinthe, and piled on billows of rich whipped cream.

How unbelievably different is this corner of French Switzerland from the simple gemütlichkeit of the German-speaking villages and towns to the northeast, such as Murten in the three-lake region west of Berne. The main highway enters and leaves Murten through thirteenth-century gates, and the houses and shops are secreted in wooden, vaulted arcades. Once a part of the Kingdom of Savoy (whose Duke built its castle), this is an officially “protected” town of great charm and several of its old inns bear their original coats of arms.

The capital of German Switzerland, and the commercial and banking center of the whole country, is Zurich. Among the city’s excellent hotels is a rather special one, the Eden au Lac, which is small (the proprietor has resisted all blandishments to expand) and furnished entirely with antiques. Its restaurant, the Perl du Lac, claims to have been the first ever to serve hot hors d’oeuvres, and these alone—pâtés en crème, feuilleté de lobster and sweet-breads among them—are worth the visit. Another famous Zurich restaurant not to be missed, and a good place to sample some of the Swiss specialties, is the Kronenhalle where paintings by Miró, Chagall and Picasso hang, unexpectedly, on the staid, dark-paneled walls. For an appetizer, try bündnerheisch, air-dried beef from the canton of Grisons (it is called viande de Grisons in the French-speaking region). The flavor is reminiscent of prosciutto, but the paper-thin slices of meat are completely without fat and delicious with a glass of Swiss beer or wine. You’ll also find on the menu bernese platte, the Swiss version of choucroute garnie, rösti, the ubiquitous fried potato dish, and cicarino, a locally grown red chicory which makes a superb salad.

The Bahnhofstrasse is the Fifth Avenue of Zurich and you can shop as well there as anywhere in the country. Prices are not low, but the quality is unimpeachable. If you do not want to take a special trip to the lace-making towns of Appenzell and St. Gallen, you can find samples of the work, plus lovely hand-embroidered lawn pillow slips and table sets, in any of Zurich’s main stores. Grieder and Co. is one of the more de luxe department stores; Jelmoli is less expensive. The official Swiss handicrafts store on the Bahnhofstrasse has an excellent selection, and the winding streets of the old part of Zurich are jammed with antique shops where you can pick up good buys in copper, brass, porcelain and wood. Ski and après-ski clothes are superb in Zurich, but don’t expect any bargains—you are paying for quality.

Lake Lucerne

To the south of Zurich, but still on the north side of the Alps, is Lucerne, one of Switzerland’s most rewarding lakes. It is wildly romantic looking, although all too often its vistas melt into mountain mists. The old walled city of Lucerne, once a vassal city of the House of Hapsburg, is full of fifteenth- and sixteenth-century houses, and its two pretty old wooden bridges, both roofed, are still in daily use. It is much more a resort city than a commercial one and is full of souvenir shops whose contents for the most part are worth only passing scrutiny. But (Continued on page 115)

You’ve never seen a cutting board like this. Jens Quistgaard built it out of end-grain blocks. The way you build a butcher block. And where it’s different, he designed it different. For a reason.

Take the size. Too small for cleaving beef. But just right to slice a lime or lemon on. And the top’s concave, so it won’t spill the juices. Take the wood. It’s Siamese teak. The stuff, not of butcher blocks, but sailing ships. (Jens chose it because it stands up so well to water.)

Then how is this board like a butcher block? Pick up the knife and start to cut. Decisively. Forget your inhibitions. You won’t dull the knife or gouge the wood. You’re cutting as your butcher cuts. Into end-grain. Not across the fibers. As to the knife itself: the blade’s the same tough Finnish stainless steel that prows the Finnish ice-breaker fleet. (The Finns would be ice-bound ten months of the year without it.) And there are two more intelligent bits. A nylon bushing—inside the scabbard slot—to keep the knife blade snug, and safe, and sharp. And the thoughtful price—just $7.95 for board and knife together.

There was more in Antony's past than Cleopatra. There was, for instance, his characterization of Brutus at the conclusion of Shakespeare's "Julius Caesar": "His life was gentle, and the elements/So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up/And say to all the world. This was a man!"

Estimates of Brutus vary. But we like what Antony said about him, if only because we have a sneaking idea that some such exclamatory—but gentle—mixture of elements is what every man thinks he is made of.

Certainly a man is a complex organism, and learning how to please him is a complex proposition. We would not presume to stand on guesses. We have gone to the highest authorities we know—i.e., men. To some 200 good friends of H&G we put twenty questions (more or less), and reading their answers we discovered a creature that is as frightened as a lemur one moment, as belligerent as the bulls of Bashan the next.

The composite male of H&G's advisory panel is a serious and sensitive family man. He prizes the good opinion of his children and his community in that order (we didn't ask about his wife). He feels that his house is the equal of any on the block and that its interior arrangements are definitely superior. But he wishes his landscape were better.

He keeps the family accounts, cooks a lot (mostly outdoors), dislikes and avoids grocery shopping. He does most of the family fix-it chores (who else?) and packs his own suitcase three to one. Believe it or not, if he had the money, he would rather buy new carpeting than make any other one purchase for his home (well, you see, he hates noise). But if he could add a single room to his house, it would be a den or study—and you know whose. He gives another (or bigger and better) bathroom almost the same priority.

In general our man does not crave housework in order to fulfill himself (although three men empty garbage regularly). But when we asked him what he would especially like to see invented, he immediately went into orbit, blue-printing gadgets that ranged from an electronic device for editing incoming noise to an automatic bedmaker. Among his labor-savers, however, were several that have been around for a while (an ice cube maker; an automatic window closer for cold mornings; a timer to turn off television after going to bed), which led us to suspect he is either a shy shopper or a laggardly inventor.

Apart from the well-being, contentment and security of his wife and children, there are a great many other things our composite adviser would like to have, all of which H&G made due note of. We combed the country for existing models (some men have fast-working godmothers) and have compiled them to spell out H&G's considered answer to the issue:

HOW TO PLEASE A MAN

See the next 56 pages.
"If you could add one thing to your home, what would it be?" In answer to that, many of our masculine consultants stipulated a new room—a very special room like one of these.

When you go around asking questions, you are bound to get some surprises—sometimes because so many people agree, sometimes because they differ. We were mildly surprised, for instance, by the near unanimity with which our experts equated the blessings of home with an open fire, a good book and quiet. That more than half of them wished their houses contained more space was not wholly unexpected, space being at the premium it is today. But our surprise mounted steadily as man after man expressed a wistful though wholly reasonable longing for the same utopia—a room of his own.

Not all of them wanted the same kind of room. For some it was a study (or "library" or "den" or "home office")—"a den of my own," said one, "where I can work or relax in relative solitude." For almost as many others it was a new bathroom—a big one equipped with all the engineering the rest of the family presumably lacked interest in. (These two groups should both be well pleased with the room on the opposite page in which a study and a bathroom are actually combined.) Many of our men mentioned an interest in keeping fit, to which end they would like to have a home gym, either a full-scale workout room or a corner just big enough for an exercise machine. But home, after all and above all, is for relaxing (the fire, the book), and to more men than we would have guessed, this means stretching out as horizontally as possible and listening to music. For more active relaxing they would like a room just for games. And the 50 per cent of our panel who assured us they were do-it-yourselfers asked for some spot where they could set up a jewelers anvil or a power saw with the calm knowledge that no little fingers would thereby be threatened with severance.

These rooms would not necessarily be reserved for the exclusive use of the master, for our paterfamilias is not a selfish man. His room-of-his-own would be shared, often or occasionally, but, according to an unwritten understanding, by invitation only.

SEVEN ROOMS MEN HAVE ASKED FOR

1 A three-way room with a view

Anyone might be forgiven for not immediately spotting this as the big luxurious bathroom so many men wish they could have to themselves. Formerly a bedroom in Mr. Irving Feintech's house in Beverly Hills, Calif., the space was redesigned to encompass not only a bath but a neatly integrated home office and dressing room. The L-shaped arrangement of desk and bookcase that combines elbowroom and arm's-reach storage with a view of a walled garden should make any man happy to be working at home. But the other side of the bookcase is a chest of many drawers, and facing it against the wall is a long counter containing more drawers and a lavatory illuminated by recessed pull-out fluorescents that are concealed between shelves by long narrow doors. This side of the room is the dressing area, a sizable runway with a vast closet at one end and the bathroom proper at the other. The latter consists of a toilet compartment screened by sliding doors of teak (like the rest of the paneling) and a stall shower which you can see through the window in front of the desk. Floored with mosaic tile and walled partly with mosaic, partly with glass, partly with quartz masonry, the shower is capped with glass like a hothouse, has a clear view overhead of green foliage and blue sky. Associate architects: Harold W. Levitt, Ernest W. LeDuc, William H. Farwell. For other bathrooms guaranteed to please a man, see pages 62-67.
A working home gym

As more and more men discover there's no place like home for trimming the waistline and keeping the heart up to snuff, the facilities for a good daily workout are beginning to seem as desirable as a good desk or a good bed. And this view is very apt to be shared by the whole family—as Dr. Arch Scurlock's four children share his enthusiasm for the gym-annex to their house in Arlington, Va. Located in a newly built structure quite separate from the main house, the gym measures 24 by 16 feet, is two stories high. Dr. Scurlock, a former all-round college athlete, knew exactly what he wanted in the way of equipment: a vaulting horse, parallel bars, a chinning bar, rings and a trampoline (stored, folded, in a cupboard). The flooring is oak. Winter heat is supplied by the same hot-water system that warms the year-round swimming pool just outside door. Architect: Caspar Neer.

A bedroom planned for him

In many households, the term master bedroom is a complete misnomer (what master ordered up all those frothy canopies, those heart-shaped pillows?). But his bedroom might well be the room a man would like to call his own, as indeed it is in the Morris Mortons' house in Beverly Hills, Calif. Designed by Mrs. Morton (professionally, Helen W. Franklin), the room is her husband's bailiwick, and his alone—the place where he can watch anything he likes on TV, spread out his papers on the desk, loll himself into nirvana or ride a wild pace on his two-wheeled horse. Having thus entranced her husband, Mrs. Morton then designed for her hours of solitude a pretty bower of her own.
A place to stretch out and listen to music

To come home, trigger the record player, lie down and listen—that appears to be a man's favorite form of unwinding the knots of tension, judging from the frequency with which our advisers mentioned it. Since architect Bancel La Farge and his wife share the same view in this matter, their living room includes both a stretch-out sofa and a daybed. Flanked by a fireplace and bookshelves is their music center—four large compartments with flush doors of walnut and walnut grilles above and below. The door to the record-player and record-storage section drops down to form a counter. A TV set is in the section above, but its door opens on vertical hinges and folds back flat against the section to the right of it. Behind the lower grille are the stereo speakers; behind the upper grille, the air-conditioning system. Music center designed by Henry Robert Kann. On pages 86-91, music systems prized by two other men.

A personal ivory tower

By whatever name they called it, a room that would combine "relative solitude" with deep upholstered comfort, good lights for reading and plenty of room for books topped our list of masculine wants. Mr. William Mazer's library offers all these plus a bonus—music and facilities for entertaining. One section of the counter at the left of the game table is topped with travertine to serve as a bar. In one side of the cabinet below are bar supplies; in the other, tuner, record player and record storage. Speakers are housed in the cabinet adjoining. Although the materials used in this room are luxurious—teak and Siamese silk—the accessories are limited to lamps and ashtrays of he-man proportions and works of art which include the painting by Miró between the windows and a scattering of pre-Columbian sculpture. Designer: Edward Wormley.
6 A he-man’s game room

The game might be anything from poker to Ping Pong, but the room, in our advisers’ concordance, should be designed to fit the game—not vice versa. Since motion picture executive Max Youngstein’s game is billiards, he made room for it in his rambling old-fashioned house in Larchmont, N. Y., by remodeling a sunporch. The fieldstone masonry that was originally part of the house exterior offered a suitably rugged starting point. To this was added paneling of pecky cypress and a covering for the upper walls of the same green felt that was used to resurface the Edwardian billiard table. A cork floor supplies ease underfoot, and an acoustical ceiling disciplines sound. From their swivel­ ing high chairs, gamsters get a good view of the table, and if they feel like looking through a magazine, some are hanging in proper men’s-club manner over a brass rod on the wall. Designer: David Barrett.

7 The compleat home workshop

Not every man who calls himself a do-it-yourselfer has skills worthy of the scope of Dr. James A. Vance’s workshop in his house in Bever­ ley Hills, Calif. But any man would envy its order, roominess, light and cheerful garden view. A goldsmith, a painter and a woodcarver who carves all his own frames, Dr. Vance has at his disposal a punch drill (left of counter), a buffer (at end of counter) and a standing power tool for woodworking (opposite counter) as well as a metal lathe in another corner of the room for turning and working gold. Simple wood frames with clamps for hand tools not only provide organized see-at-a-glance storage, they also compose the tools into remarkably effective decoration for the walls. This artisan’s utopia was formerly a bedroom. Architect, John Woolf; interior designer, Harold W. Grieve.
Directly, indirectly or between the lines our male experts expressed a desire for two great personal luxuries:

Fully engineered

BATHROOMS

Well-planned

WARDROBES

"A bath in the old Roman tradition" was the way one man capsuled every man's idea of supreme luxury: a bathroom tailored to his personal specifications. On the door of this particular room-of-his-own, he need never knock before entering. Here he would have plenty of space to bathe, shave, do exercises without bruising his elbows. He might even seek the restorative effects of such devices as a steam bath, a whirlpool, or a Finnish sauna. When he emerges, he would like to be able to lay his hands immediately on exactly the shirt, the tie, the suit, the shoes he is in the mood at the moment to wear. That, he knows, would call for the materialization of another dream—a wardrobe where he could see everything at a glance and nothing would be wrinkled by crowding.

Starting here: a series of bathrooms and dressing rooms in which some men enjoy the luxury all men crave.

A steam bath for deep relaxation

In one corner of a large bathroom, a glass-front compartment measuring 9 by 6 feet houses a steam bath as satisfying as any its owner—Mr. Harry Silbert of Beverly Hills, Calif.—might find in a well-equipped club. Along back of compartment are mosaic-tiled ledges deep enough to recline on. White cabinet at left houses steam mechanism consisting of an open-top tank filled with rocks and below that a heating unit. Above cabinet is an overhead shower that sprays water on the heated rocks to produce temperature-controlled steam. At right of benches is a shower for cooling off and a hose for rinsing out compartment. Woven plaid curtain draws across bath when not in use. Associate architects: Harold W. Levitt, Ernest W. LeDuc, William H. Farwell.

Two closets that take care of everything

Along one wall of Mr. John Hertz Jr.'s room-sized dressing room in Miami Beach, Fla., is a pair of double-door closets that keep in order practically all of his day-to-day wardrobe. The first has just enough hanging space for his most frequently worn suits plus shelves for shoes, shirts, sweaters, a small radio. Special racks on the door hold ties the way Mr. Hertz likes to store them—folded flat. The second closet contains a hanging rod for slacks, another above it for jackets and a shelf for hathoxes. In both closets, lights mounted on the undersides of the top shelves illuminate clothes below. Closet doors are pecky cypress; their scepter-like handles are brass elephant goads from India. Designer: Haygood Lasseter. For Mr. Hertz's sauna-bathroom, see page 65.
A whirlpool and steam bath in one tub

Even in a small bathroom, space can be found for the refreshing devices men are so fond of. Mr. Leopold Godowsky's bathroom in his house in Westport, Conn., is no larger than the conventional minimum (5½ by 7½ feet), yet it is packed with an astonishing variety of bathing and grooming comforts. The bath compartment designed to his specifications is lined, tub and all, with black-and-white striped tile and can be closed by sliding glass doors. Hidden within the walls is a steam-bath mechanism, the controls for which are mounted on the wall under the shower. On the tub ledge is a circulator that transforms an ordinary bath into a salubrious whirlpool. And the shower head, a Swiss device, is attached to a flexible hose so that it can be lifted off its wall mounting and used as a hand spray.

In addition, the bathroom boasts a number of smaller luxuries: a clock mounted high on the mirrored panel next to the window, below left, where it can be seen (through the open door opposite) from the dressing room; a lighted shaving mirror placed in front of the opaque glass window to provide perfect shaving visibility day or night; a whole wall of mirror-door cabinets behind the lavatory counter and toilet. The bathroom is augmented by a large, closet-lined dressing room, and a luminous ceiling canopies both rooms. Designer: William Snith. Architect: F. E. Dushin. For Mr. Godowsky's music system, turn to pages 86-89.

A sauna within a four-part bathroom

More than one of our advisers expressed a hankering for a sauna—the Finnish hot air bath that invigorates the body with dry, penetrating heat. A 7½-by-4½-foot sauna compartment with a sliding glass wall forms one section of Mr. John Hertz Jr.'s 9-by-20-foot bathroom. The bathtub is in a compartment opposite the sauna (see sketch, opposite page). The lavatory and shaving area occupy the center of the room, and the toilet is in a compartment behind sliding glass doors at the far end. The door between the sauna and tub leads to Mr. Hertz's dressing room (see page 63), the other door to his bedroom.

In the sauna, walls of rough marble strips and a bench of teak take the place of the traditional redwood, and modern technology has replaced the traditional Finnish method of heating and drying the air. Over the bench is a control panel with a battery of gauges for temperature and humidity control, switches for fans and a clock for timing the sessions. This sauna also boasts one of the customary Finnish flourishes: rocks to release hot invisible moisture when water is ladled over them. Here the rocks are on a ledge facing the bench and at the press of a pedal, water is sprayed on them automatically from pierced tubes built into the wall. In the rest of the marble-floored room, walls are covered in gray linen-like vinyl; luminous ceiling with egg-crate diffusers gives a soft, clear light.

Teak drawers for shirts roll open at a touch

The big luxurious bathroom that so many of our consultants asked for is epitomized in Mr. Doyle Cotton's bath-dressing suite in his house in Tulsa, Okla. Together the 10½-by-14½-foot bathroom and the 10-by-13½-foot dressing room consume almost as much space as a moderate-sized living room, and their materials are of living room elegance—teak for the cabinetry, gold-leafed cork for the walls, beige travertine for the shower and bath compartments and dressing and lavatory counters, off-white carpeting leopardspotted in russet and green.

In this precisely divided bathroom (see plan, below right) toilet and shower compartments are along one wall and lavatory counter lines another. Against third wall is the 4-by-6½-foot plunge bath sunk 5 feet below floor level like the chin-to-toe immersion baths travelers look forward to in Japanese inns. A chrome ladder descends into the green mosaic-tiled depths where there are wooden seats. And a powerful circulator attached to one side turns the bath into a whirlpool.

In the dressing room, hanging space with rods at different heights runs the length of one long wall. Instead of closet doors, an automatic curtain glides open at the touch of an electric switch. Along the opposite wall are twenty-four shallow drawers for shirts and sweaters topped by roomy cupboards for hats. All drawers and doors open on touch latches. Architects: O'Neil Ford & Associates.
Symbol of every man’s dilemma:

THE COAT HANGER

A quarter of a century ago I decided that I would be an author. When I took that step, I knew quite well that when I reached fifty, I would be vain, conceited and greedy for money. That would be my character: I had made the acquaintance of several authors in their fifties and that was their character, so there was little chance that I would escape. It was a professional risk. The faces of actors at thirty or so begin to grow weather-beaten with public exposure; the character of an author is eroded, but more slowly, from the same cause: his personality is always on show.

Well, I am fifty. I have taken stock. It is all much as I expected. I am vain. I talk incessantly about myself (I am doing so now). I am never satisfied with the praise that comes my way, and I never feel I have enough money. All this is right and proper for a writer of my age. I do not hold it against myself. What is quite wrong—what is shaming—is that I have too many clothes. I counted my coat hangers on my fiftieth birthday. What with suits, jackets and other items, there are sixteen of them. They are a monument to my moral cowardice. I would hide the story of why this is so except that at fifty one thinks continually upon the young: the description of my backsliding may serve as a warning.

The first thing a young writer must do is to make up his mind why he wants to write. Most young men write books to impress women and get themselves a rich wife—this, at least, is the belief of all the publishers I have known. I rejected this course. A rich wife would have been useful, but I observed that she would probably be an unhappy one. Being married to an author is certainly an honorable state, especially when he becomes a success. But then it is like being married to an Archbishop of Canterbury. Privately, he might lovingly admit that he would not be where he is had his wife not been constantly by his side: but she must on no account take this as an invitation to officiate at Evensong. She must remain in the background, and so must wives of authors.

I might have decided to write for money. I rejected this, too. Writing for money nowadays means writing best sellers. To do that takes a mastery of the arts of verbiage, self-deception and calculated mendacity so great that it would carry a man to the highest political office in the land. I decided that if I had these gifts, they ought to be put to better use and, in any case, I hadn’t got them.

I then thought of writing to express ideas that would make life a nobler and more beautiful thing, but I soon found I hadn’t got these either. In the meantime, I had filled two large folio notebooks. One day I reread them. When I had finished, it struck me that I could not write at all.

A ghost came back from the past. It was of my old schoolmaster, Mr. Wilkinson, who had once violently crossed out the margin, he had written: "What you mean is a HORSE." The incident remained in my mind because the very next day he committed suicide. We were never told at school why he had done it, but I could not help feeling at the time that it might have been because of my prose style. Now, reading my folio notebooks, I was sure it was.

I therefore sat down, day after day and month after month, to try to express clear thoughts in a plain way. This is very difficult to do in English. The Englishman does not like expressing clear thoughts in a clear style because it makes him feel French. Most English writers, therefore, do not try to do it. There are exceptions. David Hume was one, but he was a Scotsman who was driven to live in Paris to find anyone who would read his books. Still, Hume had proved that the thing could be done, and this encouraged me.

The results of my first few months of trying was a novel. It was a satire on British Colonialism, written as clear as clear could be. It was published in England and warmly welcomed as a graceful tribute from a young Indian to the sterling qualities of British Civil Servants under the Raj. Shaken by this, I sent the book to America. There, after some hesitation, the public saw what I meant, and I was launched as a writer.

But a peculiar sort of writer. I was not driven to give my thoughts to the world. On the contrary, I spent every morning sitting in my room, trying to find out what the devil my thoughts really were. I was not moved by the beauty and majesty of words. I spent every morning trying to write simple sentences as perfect as "the cat sat on the mat." In fact, somebody had given me a dog, who used to sit on the mat underneath my writing table. As an opening exercise for my evening’s work, I used to write a few lines of her autobiography, as it might be told by herself. She had a simple outlook on life, so the autobiography began: "I was born in the house of a rich American," but neither she nor I got beyond the first chapter.

The task I had set myself was all-absorbing. I saw that if I were ever to complete it—to make, that is, a style of my own—I would have time for nothing else. I was an explorer, seeking treasure in the lush jungle of current English. I had to travel light, and in chosen company. I made up my mind to stay in my room as long as I could, to have no social life, and only one or two friends. I selected the rich American who had the house where the dog was born, and I had one suit made in which to go to see him. For the rest, I limited my wardrobe to slacks and shirts and sandals (for I was living on the Mediterranean) with one pullover for winter. That stopped me going out to parties. That is, it stopped me talking about literature until I knew how to write it—and it saved money which I would otherwise have had to earn by writing drivel and bombast. In my wardrobe, then, was only one coat hanger and I was very, very proud of the fact.

So I wrote, and the time passed. I was published. More time passed, and I was understood. I was happy; the dog waxed fat; the American was hospitable, but not pressing; and I still had only one coat hanger. But then I was overcome by a great desire to see my fellow writers and hear, face to face, what they thought of my work. So I packed my shirts and socks and pullover in a suitcase, borrowed an overcoat from a friend, put on my suit and bought a cheap rail ticket for London. The dog did not want me to go and, instead of sitting on the mat, sat on my suitcase. But like a perfect fool, I ignored her advice and went.

I arrived in London and a friend whom I had known in Italy took me to a literary party. It was a most distinguished one. I was very pleased. I should perhaps explain that literary life in London is a very compact affair. It is run on a principle of reciprocation, or, in other words, taking in one another’s washing. Any dirty linen in the basket will probably lie washed in public, but that cannot be helped. The vital thing is to be accepted into the laundrymen’s union, so to speak. From the writers I saw around me, I felt I was well on my way.

In spite of the fact that I was a stranger, many of them spoke to me—not, indeed, about my books but about theirs, which was very kind of them, because it saved me from saying the wrong things: indeed, from saying anything at all. It was all most agreeable.

Then came the moment that, with natural vanity, I had been waiting for. Behind me, I heard a famous critic say: “Who is he?”

I heard the voice of my friend telling him.

“Oh,” said the famous man. “How’s he doing?”

“He’s working on a...”

“Ah,” said the critic, testily, “is he making any money?”

My friend paused. Then, in a sage voice, he said:

“Ah. Well. now. He’s only had one suit in three years and...”

“Ah,” said the great man. “Ah,” he said, then, “Well.” In those three syllables, it was clear, I was summed up, damned and dismissed.

Some time after that, Rebecca West, noticing my disconsolate look, struck up a conversation with me. We talked of H. G. Wells. She must have wondered why I asked how many suits he had. She answered, however, I forget the number, but it was a lot.

I returned to the shores of the Mediterranean, and my writing table. Once more the dog sat on the mat underneath it. I swore to her that never, never would I own more than one coat hanger and one suit, no matter how much money I made. She believed me. But then, she believed anything I said.

Well, I made some money, and for a while I kept my word. But somebody invited me to be best man at a wedding and I bought a suit for it, not to offend him. He christened his child with my first name, so I bought another new suit for the baptism, to bring luck to my godchild. I traveled. I moved to Rome. The dog came...
One of the least supportable myths of our time is the all-too-common notion that designing a room to please a man means narrowing your choices to dark woods, somber leathers and sporting prints. For every man whose taste points in that direction, we can cite a hundred whose preferences run variously to bright colors or to pale colors, to light woods or to eighteenth-century French antiques. There are some things, to be sure, that most men heartily detest—just as there are some that almost all men ask for. But these are not superficial likes and dislikes that add up to a single “look.” They are more fundamental, hence they can inspire a hundred different looks, the masculine origins of which are detectable only by observant analysis.

Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Cowles’ New York City apartment is a good example of the infinitely varied possibilities. With the help of interior designers Edward Wormley and Richard Kent, Mrs. Cowles set out to give her husband exactly what he wanted. That she succeeded is not surprising. What might be surprising (to the sporting-print school) is that the Cowles’ duplex has the clear, lively sparkle you would more reasonably expect had the lady set out to please only herself. Yet, beneath the surface every room plainly reveals not only how the president of Cowles Magazine and Broadcasting Inc., likes to live, but how, in principle, almost any man would like to live.

Like all men (see page 92), Mr. Cowles loves a comfortable chair. So Mrs. Cowles by-passed the more delicate type of antiques on which men perch uneasily as if for flight, in favor of deep-cushioned, generously dimensioned contemporary chairs and sofas for every room. As much as the next man, Mr. Cowles is partial to leather, and he got it—not in waiting-room browns but in clear reds, oranges, even white. And when he sits down in a chair, leather or otherwise, he doesn’t want to have to stretch halfway across the room to reach an ashtray or park a drink. Mrs. Cowles has seen to it that he doesn’t have to. Nor does he, a voracious reader, ever have to move to another chair or another room to get a better light on his book.

Like so many of H&G’s male counselors, Mr. Cowles wanted a room of his own. His room is a library, opposite page, where “the fire, the book” and almost every other benefaction cited by our experts are in generous supply. There is wood paneling, of walnut. There is a substantial ladder for reaching the topmost of the bookshelves that line the two long walls. There are tall broad-brimmed lamps to read the books by, and to read them in, not only deep-seated armchairs but, opposite the fireplace, a sofa of stretch-out length. Not prominent but always within easy range is a TV set and a bar.

the same dedication to solid comfort. Knowing that her husband, like most men, feels hemmed in by clutter, Mrs. Cowles also endorsed simple, space-making furniture arrangements and unfussy window treatments—blinds or valance-less curtains. There is no confusion underfoot—floors are carpeted wall-to-wall or kept wholly, beautifully bare. And to achieve the ends usually attempted with man-made furbelows (which men tend to be cool to), Mrs. Cowles turned to more natural decoration—flowers. They greet you in the entrance hall, make a cheerful display in the morning room as you can see on our cover, and spill over into every other room in the apartment. Each Monday morning fresh armloads arrive from the Cowles' gardens in the country.

Mrs. Cowles loves vivid color. So does her husband. Echoing, no doubt, the suppressed inner voice of many men, he would be happy if she were even bolder in her use of it. But in this apartment a certain restraint was in order, for she wanted to create a congenial background for Mr. Cowles' distinguished collection of paintings and sculpture. An ardent patron of contemporary art (he is a Trustee of the Museum of Modern Art), he likes to live with some of his paintings in every room. His direct contribution to the apartment planning was to decide where each picture should go and hang it there himself.

A large part of his collection is in the living room, opposite page, a long spacious room well designed for entertaining. Since both the Cowleses are good listeners as well as lively conversationalists, they like to invite their friends in the small numbers that make good talk possible—and to provide each individual with the ease that makes it probable.

A pair of oversized sofas ranged along one wall obviates the clutter often perpetrated by a flock of chairs. For small women who find it more comfortable not to be enveloped in upholstery, there are two walnut-framed Louis XV fauteuils that make gentle, softening accents for the straight lines and large scale of the rest of the furniture. And for men who like to hold impromptu conferences, there is a pedestal table in one corner of the room, above left, plus leather-cushioned chairs.

The squares of bleached burlap that cover the wall make an excellent matte background for the abundance of paintings—also make it easier to switch them around from time to time without leaving tell-tale marks.

The dining room, left, at the other end of the hall has a distinctly gala air. Delicate swag-and-shell moldings, a Baroque marble mantle framed with a big mirror, a shimmering crystal chandelier (Continued on page 74)
close-up inspection in the sitting room: Chagall prints, a Braque lithograph and an antique chinoiserie screen make an appropriately dressy setting for black-tie dinners. But these embellishments are for the most part above eye level, for the furniture is as comfortable and forthright as that in the living room or the library. The octagonal walnut dining table expands to seat twelve with no crowding, and in the upholstered armchairs the men can linger over their cigars and brandy in full living room ease. For dinner parties of more than twelve, small tables for six are set up at the ends of the big room, and Mr. and Mrs. Cowles circulate by changing places after each course with two of their guests.

The same tangible but unobtrusive comfort has been achieved in the more intimate precincts upstairs. In the family sitting room and master bedroom, as in every other room in the apartment, Mrs. Cowles has adhered to a formula of soft, mostly light colors, plus one positive pattern. But even here there are no frills.

Although the sitting room, left, bears little resemblance to the library, it is a room a man can feel equally at home in. For feet-up comfort, the room offers not one but two oversized wing chairs with inclined ottomans plus a stretch-out single-cushioned sofa. Small nesting tables pull out from under the coffee table to hold Sunday night tray suppers or Mr. Cowles’ breakfast tray. And the robust appeal of leather has not been overlooked—it makes the white overcurtains.

The Cowles’ bedroom, opposite page, is actually more like another sitting room than a boudoir for it offers both a deep-cushioned armchair and a sofa with good lamps nearby for reading. In lieu of an ultra-feminine flowered fabric, the print here is a bold, vivid Paisley which is used for both the upholstered furniture and the strictly tailored window shades. Since morning light is an anathema to Mr. Cowles, these are abetted by blackout shades next to the window and shutters inside the room. The pale pink of the painted strawcloth-covered walls might be considered a concession to femininity if it were not for the bolstering it gets from the black carpet that serves magically to strengthen every color in the room.

Personal paraphernalia for dressing and grooming are nowhere in evidence for there are adjoining bathrooms and dressing rooms for both Mr. and Mrs. Cowles. But the bedroom does contain one small area dedicated exclusively to Mrs. Cowles’ personal convenience—the office in which she plans all the operations of the household.

Above her planning desk in the master bedroom, Mrs. Cowles keeps a changing collection of small paintings, memorabilia
A HOUSE TO PLEASE HIMSELF continued

MATERIALS: "Being basically lazy, I hate to spend all of my free time keeping up with maintenance chores. So I used materials that would age pleasantly—stone, glass, asphalt shingles, stained wood—and leave me free on weekends to enjoy the house..."

THE LABOR: "I worked out a design that would be within the scope of my limited construction abilities. It is a good healthy feeling to build your own shelter."

THE LIVING ROOM: "We wanted a room [right] that would be intimate enough for the two of us, yet large enough to accommodate a rained-out cocktail party. It had to double for dining, so we settled for a large refectory-type table which I fashioned out of some old door panels, a Flexwood top, Formica, copper and carved wood molding..."

THE KITCHEN: "I really had no business laying out the kitchen but Ann does not draw. Mainly she wanted an open bright room that would not be too large to be efficient or so small as to be cramped. For my part, I like to be able to see her as she prepares the meals, whether I am in the living room or on the deck. Since she is left-handed, I planned the functioning in reverse, but it is also comfortable for me."

THE BABY'S ROOM: "For the present her room is separated from the living room by a screen divider [right, beyond white wallboard], until we decide how much more storage space she will need. As the family grows, we will probably build another room on the roof of our present bedroom which was structurally designed for that purpose..."

THE BEDROOM: "For me the master bedroom [above] must be as far removed as possible from the rest of the house... I dislike clutter and too much furniture..."

THE MASTER BATHROOM: "It is large for a house the size of ours—6 by 18 feet. But to me it is almost pagan to be able to lie stretched out and totally immersed in a round tiled plunge bath [below] 5½ feet in diameter..."

ONE REGRET: "I personally would like to have had a workshop, but land size and wallet size did not permit. Someday..."

The house
a man built
to please himself

For a long narrow lot in a closely built-up section of Miami, Florida, a young architectural designer, Darrell F. Fleeger, designed this house as a home for himself, his wife, Ann, and their infant daughter. "I wanted my house to look as if I had built it," he explains, and close to half the labor that went into its building was, in fact, his. Hence it is an uncommonly complete and vigorous expression of a man’s ideas on the spirit and the substance of home. Here are the facts: A high wall of coral rock, built 6 feet within the building line, encloses the house, a large forecourt and swimming pool, two patios and two small courts. The house itself, walled almost entirely of glass, contains 1,800 square feet within its two rectangular sections connected by a glass-walled gallery (see plan below). The bedroom section has a flat roof, but the forward, living section is roofed by an adventurous, high-peaked construction of laminated beams and pine planks, left, that seems to hover above the transparent building and its concrete deck like a great protective bird. More elucidating than any further commentary by H&G, we think, are the following extracts from the notes we received from designer Fleeger:

THE ROOF: "There is, to my knowledge, no name for its shape. I arrived at it after many hours of searching for a form that would be playful on the exterior, high and thin on the interior and still feasible structurally. We love the changes in ceiling heights it gives us—and the patterns the trusses take when seen from different angles..."

THE DECK: "As a boy, I used to enjoy the front porch on our house in Pennsylvania. At twilight we would all sit out and watch the neighbors watch us. Today, with the invasion of the automobile, a front porch has its disadvantages. But within our surrounding wall, we have our porch without the disadvantages. And by placing it over the pool we have gained a new advantage—the soothing effect of water..."

THE POOL: "When we spend so much for this luxury, we should get our money’s worth. Pools are cooling to the eyes as well as to the touch. These thoughts dictated the prominent location of ours where it can always be seen as well as used..."

Color and a sense of humor temper the ruggedness of

a wife built to please her husband

The classic planning team composed of husband, wife and architect may divide itself in any one of several different ways. Sometimes a couple works together with the architect; sometimes one or the other takes the lead. In the case of the Derek Parmenters of San Francisco, Calif., it was Mrs. Parmenter—a decorator as well as mother of three—who worked with designer John Carden Campbell of the architectural firm of Campbell & Wong to produce a vacation house specifically calculated to please her husband.

Built on a seaward-looking cliff in Bolinas, Calif., the house has all the ruggedness men love in a vacation retreat plus the warmth and gaiety Mrs. Parmenter created through her use of color and her deft choice of furniture and accessories. Mr. Parmenter had chosen the site because the cliff, with its wild undergrowth of scrub chaparral, reminded him of his own youthful hunting ground on the New England coast. The house, of rough boards and battens painted a weathered green, is as rugged-looking as its surroundings, and rears up over them like an eagle's nest to survey the sweep of the Pacific. The entire structure is, in fact, hung on six great wooden piles which are firmly embedded in the ground below and rise straight up through the house to support the roof.

To make the most of the site, and to create a house closely tailored to the family’s needs, designer Campbell suggested the hexagonal plan which includes a big and versatile living space plus a three-bedroom sleeping area with a remarkable degree of privacy for a house of 1,370 square feet. Three angled outside walls give the living room a panoramic 180° view, and help to define the areas for cooking, dining and lounging. The inglenook centered in the fourth side of the room behind the towering fireplace was an idea Mrs. Parmenter developed to create a quiet retreat for her husband. Its 8-foot-high walls effectively screen the bedroom area as well as turn the nook into a cozy pocket of space, psychologically separated from everything going on in the rest of the house.

The nook is lined with simple wood platforms topped by innerspring mattresses, the corners of which Mrs. Parmenter cut so that they fit together like a jigsaw puzzle. A brilliant plaid dress wool, tucked around them, looks appropriately masculine and is as child-proof and easy to keep clean as the bare pine floors of the whole house. Some of her husband’s personal finds—a whacky Victorian wheel chair, a Mexican whale-patterned serape—prominently ornament the other side of the living room, and a personal conviction of Mr. Parmenter’s is largely responsible for the plan of the kitchen. He persuaded her that dispensing with overhead cupboards would keep cooking and serving gear to a minimum. “Unless she is deceiving me,” reports Mr. Parmenter, “the idea suits her admirably.”

Six-sided plan was sliced into wedges to make three bedrooms, two baths and a wide-angled living room that fans out from central nook. Front door opens to one side of living room. Outside door from children’s bathroom next to kitchen opens to small deck that has outside shower for swimmers. Including couches in living room and inglenook and bunk beds in children’s rooms, the house can sleep twelve people.
Men love gadgets. Anything from a midget screwdriver to a complex push-button network that promises to do its job in look-ma-no-hands fashion will fascinate a man. Every one of our masculine authorities came up with at least one imaginative device he would like to see invented. But few matched the ingenuity of the electronic gates that Mr. John Hertz Jr. has installed to increase the efficiency of the parking space outside his house in Miami Beach, Fla.
A connoisseur of automation, Mr. Hertz has filled his house with devices to bring order and ease to daily living (see his bathroom, page 65; his wardrobe, page 63). Most spectacular of them all is the series of electronically controlled gates and signs he has designed to keep his parking court from becoming an automobile jungle.

As you drive up to the outer gates, your car crosses a treadle (1 on plan, above right) that opens them and activates the first instruction panel (2). Normally, the top section lights up informing you that “Gates will open in 7 seconds.” But the parking court can hold no more than four cars, so if yours is the fifth, the lighted second section announces “Parking lot filled.” Pressing “black button on gate” rings a bell inside the house to apprise the occupants of your arrival on foot. The third signal is for emergencies only. A time clock shuts off the system at 2:00 A.M. (or any other time when Mr. Hertz does not wish to be disturbed), turns it on again at 7:00 A.M.

Once you are inside the parking court, the upper part of the sign on the garage lights up, asking you not to block the garage door. As you turn toward the parking area, another lighted sign (4) beckons you in so gates will close behind you.

When you leave the car, you walk to the gate of the trellised arbor at the right of the garage that leads to the front door. If that gate is locked, an intercom will connect you with the house and someone will admit you by pressing a button.

When you drive away, the lower section of the garage sign (3) lights up to urge you forward until you drive over the inside treadle that opens the gates. Thus directed, you move out again to the uncontrolled, automationless world of traffic.
We asked our panel of experts, "When your time is your own, how do you spend it?"
Again and again we heard the answer: "Listening to music."

Two music systems
any man would envy

Like a steady obbligato to our discussions of how to please a man were the repeated references to the pleasures of listening to music at home. This is a pleasure a man is likely to share with his family (none of our enthusiasts indicated he was in the habit of listening with earphones). But he is the one, as a rule, who is most passionately concerned with the technical aspects of the music equipment and the quality of its tone. However good his sound system may be, he wishes it were better—the equal, for instance, of the two outlined on these and the next four pages.

1. A perfectionist's sound center

The basement of the Leopold Godowskys' house in Westport, Conn., contains six 100-watt amplifiers—enough to shiver half-a-dozen baseball stadiums. Only one watt of each amplifier's power is used. But the result is recorded music with the absolute minimum of distortion—the purest sound reproduction to be heard in Westport or, very likely, anywhere else. Fred Kamiel of Hi-Fi Headquarters who designed the system compares the prodigality of its wattage to buying a huge vat of milk and skimming off the cream. But to Leopold Godowsky the extravagance is wholly justified for, as the son of a famous pianist, an accomplished violinist in his own right, a chemist and co-inventor of Kodachrome, he combines the musician's sensitivity to sound imperfections with the inventor's urge to remedy them. And perfection in this case was all the more easily achieved because his music system was installed at the most propitious time—during the construction of his house.

The backbone of this unique system is housed in a cabinet in a storage wall in the study. Included in the equipment are two turntables, two tape recorders, two electronic crossovers, two preamplifiers, two tone equalizers, two tuners. The reason for all this duplication is that Mr. Godowsky believes, as do many experts, that no music system is any better than the recording or tape it brings to life—and that the true merit of a recording or tape can only be judged by switching back and forth between two sets of apparatus. What one may disclose, the other may veil—and vice versa.

In a cabinet next to the sound control center is a television set on a turntable that swivels 360 degrees so that it may be viewed either from the study or from the living room next door. Both TV and the film projector in a booth adjacent to the living room share with the record and tape players a galaxy of some thirty speakers that channel the sound to the living room, the master bedroom and outdoors to a lagoon as well as to the study itself. The living room speakers (Continued on page 88) are mounted in cabinets on the other side of the sound-center storage wall which also has in its center a core of sand to offset vibration.

The uses to which all these electronic riches are put are as varied and extensive as the scope of the equipment. Since Mr. Godowsky's musician friends are legion, the strains of live chamber music are often to be heard in his house and taped for future hearings. He is frequently asked by manufacturers to measure the quality of new recordings and also to judge new equipment. In addition, he makes experimental films, and he is currently perfecting a technique whereby contemporary history can be endurably recorded for posterity. "Living Archives" is the name of this project which he hopes may someday offer the miraculous equivalent of being able to enjoy today a Shakespeare play as given in Shakespeare's time, or to hear the Gettysburg Address delivered by Abraham Lincoln. Although these performances are now lost to us, Mr. Godowsky points out that there is still time, for instance, to record in sight and sound the temple of Abu Simbel in Egypt before the waters of the Nile rise to claim it forever.

BOOK WALL OF STUDY is at right angles to sound-center storage wall (see plan, left), and includes at each end a large fabric-faced compartment for stereo speakers. The multi-room speaker system is also shared by swiveling TV and by film projection booth next to the living room fireplace.
SPEAKER WALL IN LIVING ROOM—the reverse side of the study's sound-center storage wall—has hinged panels covered in pale yellow silk. Center panels are opened only for viewing television, the others for access to batteries of speakers. Mounted in the wall at the right of the fireplace is a painting that slides back on tracks to reveal window of the projection booth behind it. The painting, like many others in the house, is Mrs. Godowsky's work. Interior designer: Donald Hess; furniture by Dunbar.
Fourteen years ago, Daniel Karsh, a New York advertising executive, acquired his first better-than-average hi-fi equipment, and he has been changing it constantly ever since. Always on the lookout for something, somewhere, that might be added by way of improvement, he has usually found it. But at the moment, says Mrs. Karsh, he seems almost willing to admit that the installation in their apartment living room is as close to perfection as a music system can currently come. And in addition to its sonic merits, the equipment is housed in a way that makes it uncommonly easy to look at and to use.

The three elements that require the most manual attention—a highly sensitive, single-record turntable for very special recordings, a tape recorder and a record-changer for party music—are lined up side by side in a long horizontal wall cabinet about the height of a bar. The cabinet has no top, but each of its three compartments has its own lift-up lid of transparent Plexiglas so that the unit within is always visible, but always protected from dust. At one end of this record-player bar, but set into a compartment in an adjacent floor-to-ceiling vertical cabinet, are tuner and preamplifier. Their controls are also exposed permanently to view—as is the Karshes' record collection stored on two long shelves beneath the bar. One-piece flush doors, however, hide the tape collection in the upper section of the vertical cabinet and the amplifiers in the lower section.

The arrangement of these many parts is the epitome of common sense. But the design and materials of the cabinets that contain them have turned the Karshes' music center into the most important architectural element of the room. When the doors of the vertical cabinet are closed, it has the look of a strong wood column bisected by the record-player bar and its adjacent control panel. And both cabinets are made of walnut, in bold contrast to the lighter toned cherry that panels the whole long wall of the room including the fireplace breast.
What every man prizes above all else in his house:

THE MOST COMFORTABLE CHAIR

Sooner or later, one way or another, every man H&G quizzed came out with the statement that home was the place where a man should be sure of finding a really comfortable chair. A rocking chair, said some, "a chair as comfortable as a bed," said others—or "a soft roomy armchair with something to put my feet on." Prodded by these stipulations we searched the market for chairs which would, literally, fill the bill. Here are seven, each unmistakably man-sized, each covered in the kind of simple, sturdy upholstery materials men like best. And each is calculated to please a man in a different mood, whether he is of a mind to sit and read, or to sit and watch TV, or merely to sit—and hopefully sneak in a cat nap before dinner. For a directory of stores carrying these chairs as well as other products for the man of the house, please turn to page 122.
For basking in the sun, a man might tote this lightweight steel-framed lounge chair wherever he pleases. Top section, padded with bright blue cushions, swivels freely on the base, 37½ inches in diameter. George Tanier. Through decorators.

For his role as patriarch, a man would be gratified to find the upholstered rocker, right, stationed in the playroom so he can enjoy the children's hour in utter comfort. $89. Selig.

For watching TV, the King-of-Ease arm chair and ottoman, right, give a man as much cushioned luxury as if he were lying in bed. Chair back adjusts to several different angles. $275 in muslin. Ottoman, $78. Kittinger.

For daydreaming by the fire, a man might ensconce himself in this generously wide (32-inch) armchair with its soft foam rubber and Dacron cushions. By Knoll. Through decorators.
The large majority of our masculine experts like to cook and several said they would like a new kitchen. Here is one designed by a man who had ideas about

A KITCHEN OF HIS OWN

If a man cooks, whether every day or every now and then, you can be reasonably sure that he is doing so primarily because he enjoys cooking. The same can hardly be said of all women who cook, which may account for the fact that many women are happiest cooking in a room that offers very little evidence of being a kitchen.

A man, on the other hand, often prefers to have every tool of his part-time trade in full sight, not merely for the sake of convenience, but simply because he likes to look at them. This is the kind of forthright, functional kitchen that Mr. Gordon Tevis designed when he and his wife decided to remodel a gloomy kitchen, butler's pantry and storeroom in their house in San Francisco. For in the Tevis household, it is Mr. Tevis, cheered on by his wife, who rules the range. None of the equipment in the new kitchen is built in. Many of the staples and all of the seasonings are stored on open shelves. And most of the pots and pans—a glorious collection of brass and copper accumulated over the years—are not stored at all but exhibited, and as proudly as if they were rare Meissen or pre-Columbian sculpture. For his stove, Mr. Tevis chose a restaurant model of stainless steel because it was "large, firm and durable" and also contained in the top a salamander or open broiler which he (along with most famous chefs) considers mandatory for proper broiling. His work center is a huge baker's table to which he has added drawers for utensils and, at one end, a sheathed rack for his carving knives. (Paring knives cling to a magnetic holder on the wall next to the sink.) Yet, in this no-nonsense atmosphere, an antique drop-leaf table and splat-back chairs, which the Tevises introduced into the breakfast area that they gained by the demolition of the butler's pantry wall, look undeniably at home.

Three-part arrangement of new kitchen follows former division of space into three rooms. Aluminum double-door restaurant refrigerator stands in one corner of former storeroom, where staples and baking dishes are stored on open shelves. Food preparation area in center seems much more spacious since removal of butler's pantry wall, yet breakfast area has sacrificed none of its former usefulness: there are cabinets at four corners for china and glasses, a vegetable cooler under the sink. Remodeling by Edmond De Martini of De Martini Bros. Undisputed stars of this man's working kitchen are the mammoth restaurant range and the old butcher's rack laden with brass and copper over the antique apothecary's chest where Mr. Tevis files small special-purpose gadgets. Range includes a plate-warming cupboard (a Tevis addition) with three adjustable shelves. Next to it is a broiler with a tray that raises and lowers on ball bearings. Around corner is a trio of warming drawers, above, that keep food hot and either moist or crisp until ready to serve. For one of Mr. Tevis' recipes, see page 110.

A row of copper pots are strung like beads on a brass rail across the opening created by removing the wall of the old butler's pantry. In the area they gained, by the newly added window that looks out across San Francisco Bay, the Tevises have breakfast, and, in the evening, guests drink their aperitifs while watching Mr. Tevis prepare dinner.
“Having the people you like around you” rated high on our consultants’ lists of at-home pleasures, but we came across a wide divergence of opinion on the art of HOSTMANSHIP and the kind of parties men like to give and go to.
What kind of guests do they like?

PHILIPPE COCHIN: "We like to see people who travel. They can talk about everything, not just their own business."

PROFESSOR CONWAY: "Sometimes you run into people who have only one subject. They dominate the talk with their subject and what they think. They're the worst kind of dinner guest. People have an obligation to do their part when they're invited out. It's like a part in a play. Some of the time you have to listen—a good deal of the time you have to listen—and some of the time you have to talk."

LOUIS HARDIN, Chicago lawyer: "I think the most interesting party is one where you have different people, in different walks of life, from different parts of the country. That's much easier to do in a city than it is in a suburb."

PROFESSOR CONWAY: "Guests ought to realize there are times when you don't want help. We have to entertain without servants, as almost everybody does. One of Dorothy's pet peeves is people who jump up to help her when she leaves the table to do something."

To dress or not to dress

"Dress according to the occasion" was the most common answer. By our own observation, men in the suburbs, in the West and in the Middle West preferred informal dress. In large cities, in the East and the South, "black tie" or at least a dark suit had more supporters.

ALFRED HITCHCOCK: "I think the whole question of dressing is rather academic; it depends on the occasion. What I do object to is a man appearing for dinner in a light suit. It doesn't grace the table very well."

PHILIPPE COCHIN: "I prefer black tie. Men have to change anyway when they come home from the office; black tie doesn't give them much difficulty. It's cleaner and more elegant . . . and the women always dress."

WHITFIELD MARSHALL, Houston lawyer: "I prefer black tie for dinner because there's no decision involved. It's a great simplifier of life."

TED NIERENBERG, president of Dansk Designs: "I don't like to dress formally unless I'm going to be served formally. To me black tie means adequate service."

PROFESSOR CONWAY: "One thing I hate is costume parties. I think the problem is that I work with costumes so much in the theatre, I hate to have to go somewhere in a costume."

Food for entertaining

Food—and they liked it festive—was important to all our hosts, whether they were cooks, providers or only consumers. The general lack of enthusiasm among them for the cocktail party seemed due even more to inadequate food than to noise and overcrowding.

WILLIAM HOLZHAUSER: "A successful dinner party has a lot in common with a successful play. A flair for showmanship and a sense of the dramatic are as essential to a cook as his sense of taste. The perfect menu, I believe, is full of little surprises. It includes courses with a story behind them. For instance, a platter of roast pintail ducks might recall a magnificent performance turned in by my Labrador retriever, or I can share over a roast of venison the memory of being caught in that blizzard on Idaho's Lemhi pass."

ROBERT BROOKER: "In the summer, after we go salmon fishing, we plan our parties around a first course of Atlantic salmon. You never lack a topic of conversation if you have a twenty- or twenty-five-pound salmon on a platter."

PROFESSOR CONWAY: "The host or hostess has an obligation to serve food that can be eaten easily in the circumstances provided."

ROBERT BROOKER: "I would think foreign visitors should be given something typical of American cooking and as different as possible from what they might get at home."

The buffet vs. the seated dinner

This called for a definition of terms. What most of our men had in mind when they spoke of "buffets" were meals eaten from a tray or a plate balanced on the lap. To them, if you sit at a table, it is a seated dinner even if you have served yourself from a buffet.

LLOYD BRYAN, retired engineer: "I'm a poor trout eater and I don't like those little things you have to stand up and whistle on. We always go to the effort of putting up tables even if we have to go to the extent of building tables. Also, we usually serve something that has to be cut—if you eat on your lap, you don't want to cut."

TED NIERENBERG: "I like buffets very much. If you don't have space and service to manage more than six at the dining table, a buffet is the best way to have a gathering of friends for as long as you'd like to have them. But the menu has to be thought out. Anybody who serves fried chicken at a buffet ought to have his head examined. Knives don't belong on the buffet table."

FREDERIC CAMMANN: "When we entertain in the city, it's a formal dinner party. In the country it's always buffet. Everyone's expected to come in comfortable clothes, and everybody helps with everything. Deciding which kind of party to give is a matter of finding out what you've got and what you can do with it, and not trying to do a classic dinner party in a situation that doesn't fit a classic dinner party. People don't really have very much fun when anything seems forced."

Games, anyone?

For the most part the answer to this was a resounding "No." But "nice relaxing activities" like swimming, shuffleboard, dancing and listening to music escaped the ban.

ROBERT BROOKER: "If you're going to show movies or play bridge, you organize the party on that basis—invite only the people interested."

LOUIS HARDIN: "To give a good party you have to make people at ease. I don't think games are conducive to ease and that's why I object to them. Certainly they don't put me at ease. There may be some people with a great proficiency at games who enjoy them because it gives them a chance to display their proficiency."

PROFESSOR CONWAY: "I think games are awful. There's nothing worse than an American Thanksgiving dinner that ends up with two or three kinds of pie—then the hostess wants to play parlour games."

LOUIS HARDIN: "I don't think conversation is a necessary part of entertaining. Instead, a party might have music, dancing, a certain degree of relaxing so you forget your inhibitions and do some absurd things you didn't think you were capable of doing. Too much effort to make interesting conversation can seem studied—and be irritating."

In summary

There's no such thing as the one kind of party that all men like, but then, there's no one kind of man. We've come to the conclusion that if any kind of party is well planned and executed with attention to the comfort and interests of the guests, and if hosts and guests are really interested in each other, then it will be a party to please a man. For instance, the five different kinds of parties given and enjoyed by five good hosts—and hostesses—starting on the next page.
A seated dinner without a dining room

Men who like to eat at a proper dining table will put considerable effort into achieving that goal. The Frederic Cammanns, a young couple with limited space and unlimited ingenuity, have successfully reconciled their lack of dining room with their preference for served-and-seated dinner parties. When twenty guests joined them recently for an engagement party, the apartment living room became dining room with some rearrangement of furniture and two caterer’s tables to supplement the family dining table. But where to serve before-dinner drinks? The problem was solved with the help of friends who lived on another floor of the same building. The Cammanns greeted guests, took their coats and sent them upstairs for cocktails. But as Mr. Cammann said later, “You can’t spend the rest of your life going to someone else’s apartment to serve cocktails. What we’ll do next time is send the children to their grandmother’s, put our bed in the children’s room and turn our bedroom into the room for cocktails.” At the engagement party, at 8:30 the host and hostess each gathered a group and led them downstairs to dinner. After dinner, however, there was the problem of changing the living room back to its original state. The host rose and said, “If the ladies will please leave the room, the gentlemen have a little job to do. You may not believe it, but this is a living room and we have to move out the dining tables.” The men went to work, Mr. Cammann reports, and in five minutes the room had been restored to living room status. “What’s more,” he says, “they all had a great time doing it.”

An accomplished cook’s impromptu dinner

Many a man hesitates to whip up a party on the spur of the moment for fear of upsetting the cook’s, i.e., his wife’s, schedule. John Conway doesn’t have that problem: he’s the cook. And although both he and his wife have incredibly busy schedules—he as a Professor of Drama, she as a portrait photographer, both as active participants in Seattle’s civic and artistic affairs—he undertakes with equally unruffled calm a last-minute dinner for an Indian playwright or a lasagne supper for eighty after the opera. The latter, naturally, takes planning. “But if we had to plan every party ahead of time,” Mrs. Conway says, “we wouldn’t see anyone.” How do they manage? One part of the answer is teamwork; a second is organization (in their small kitchen, everything the professor needs is at arms’ reach; in the dining area, table appointments are stored Japanese-style in labeled boxes). A third part of the answer is Professor Conway’s skill in cooking. Most of his repertoire is Chinese or Japanese—ideal for impromptu parties since these dishes are quick to prepare and to cook. The menu for one party started with Mongol soup, cooked in its traditional brass stew on the hearth. Hungry guests served themselves, while others lingered at the kitchen door watching the professor put final touches on Chinese noodles, salmon teriyaki. This host-cook’s only regret: “I don’t like to be shut away while I’m cooking. Next kitchen I design is going to be like a drugstore counter.”
The Frederic Commons' living room plays a one-night stand as dining room with the addition of two caterer's tables.

A barbecue brought to perfection

Most men, if they cook at all, consider outdoor cooking their special province. But few have studied the subject as thoroughly as Lloyd Bryan, and fewer still have designed and built their own equipment. Mr. Bryan has designed three barbecues: one indoors, with a section for smoke cooking (he cooks all the meat for family meals), another outdoors and a portable version, "The Rovin' Stove." Set in a long tile-topped table that serves as either buffet or dining table, the outdoor barbecue has a tight-fitting but removable cover and a fire-box that can be raised and lowered hydraulically to control the intensity of the heat. "To judge the heat," Mr. Bryan says, "I touch the cover. If it's too hot to touch, it's too hot to cook in." A firm believer in long, slow, covered cooking, Mr. Bryan put a suckling pig, the star of his summer barbecue, on the grill at 7:00 A.M. and left it there all day, basting it occasionally and regulating the fire. (For the whole menu and details of Mr. Bryan's technique, see page 108.) Guests arrived around 5:00 and the host was free to join them for drinks and some not-too-serious shuffleboard by the river. When the pig was ready for carving, the guests, under Mrs. Bryan's supervision, set up card tables on the shuffleboard court. Mr. Bryan removed the roasted pig and the grill, raised the fire-box, tossed on some logs and soon had a blazing fire to illuminate the table and signal the guests that dinner was served.

Drinks, a relaxing game of shuffleboard...
A satisfying cocktail party

When fully examined, most masculine objections to the cocktail party are aimed not at the idea but at the abuses: too much noise, too many people, and, above all, too much to drink and not enough to eat. A cocktail party as it should be, and as it is at the Louis Hardins' in Chicago, is a wonderful way to gather up a group of interesting but busy people on the spur of the moment. The Hardins are busy people themselves and they very rarely have time to plan, but “love to have lots of people all at once.” Their colorful, art-filled apartment is enough in itself to put people in a party mood. And the background of a party, to Mr. Hardin, is most important: “It is difficult for me to conceive of people feeling at home in stuffy and dreary surroundings... The place where a party is held should be conducive to gaiety of spirit and freedom of thought and expression... It must have a cheerful and relaxing atmosphere.” Mrs. Hardin believes, “People should not have to stand around waiting. They should have what they want when they want it.” At a recent Hardin party, guests found ample ingredients for do-it-yourself drink-mixing on the sideboard in the dining room, and on the dining table, a selection of beer, wine and champagne. The generous buffet included a huge chafing dish of spareribs, tiny hamburgers to be broiled on a tiny hibachi, a variety of hors d'oeuvres—sustaining fare for stayers, and almost too tempting for those who had dinner dates. For men's views on serving drinks, see Corkscrew, page 114.

A comfortable buffet

Buffet dinners—the eat-from-lap variety—would rate much higher with men if the host or hostess always took care to plan a menu that could be eaten with a fork. As one of our consultants remarked, “Knives have no place on a buffet table.” A good example of the right kind of food for a buffet supper was that served by the Philippe Cochins at a bon voyage party for friends in the diplomatic service who were returning to Chile. The pâté en gelée, vol-au-vent filled with an egg and mushroom mixture, salad of endive and beets were all easy to serve, easy to eat and delicious. In the Cochins' small apartment, the dining room has been converted to a study and they dine at one end of the living room. But for the party, they restored the dining room to its original purpose. This not only gave them more party space, it removed one of the less attractive aspects of buffet-service in tight quarters: the sight of the ravaged table. The timing of the party was perfect; the cocktail period was just long enough to allow guests a couple of drinks. (Another often-voiced masculine complaint is the too-prolonged cocktail hour, especially at midweek parties, and the late-late dinner that makes the following day a purgatory.) At the Cochins' party, guests had time after dinner to sit around and talk relaxedly over their coffee and liqueurs, to dance a little and still be home well before midnight.

Are men America’s best cooks? Men are, demonstrably, the world’s best chefs, but how are they in the home as distinct from the professional kitchen with its sous chefs and myrmidons? Are American men wedded only to the bar and the barbecue? In pursuit of answers to these controversial questions, we asked everyone we met, “Do you know a man who likes to cook, really and regularly, not just as a sometime thing?” We uncovered hidden culinary talent everywhere, in men from vastly different fields—a TV star, a Bishop, an artist, a vice-admiral. All were enthusiastic, original and opinionated cooks, many were given to specialization: game and meat cookery, Italian or French cuisine, egg or seafood dishes, regional foods. They would willingly spend hours working out a recipe or adapting a classic, thought nothing of planning a party for great numbers of guests (or, on the other hand, firmly limiting the list if the food would suffer from mass production). To a man, they said cooking was a creative, satisfying relaxation. They were sensible about menu planning, carefully avoiding collision courses that would require simultaneous, last-minute attention. In almost every case, wine was an important, integral part of the menu, chosen to complement the food—or the food to enhance the wine (for their own words on wine and liquor, turn to page 114). Here are the results of our quest. We think they make a pretty good case for men as America’s best cooks (even the women professionals who tried out the recipes were impressed). The defense rests.

Abalone Cannelloni

6 abalone steaks (or 3 1-pound cans abalone)
4 tablespoons softened butter
Flour
1 cup coarsely chopped cooked shrimp
1 cup coarsely chopped cooked lobster
% cup chopped Cheddar cheese
% cup ricotta or cream cheese
2 tablespoons chopped chives
4-ounce jar sliced pimientos, drained
% teaspoon each: dried oregano, rosemary, powdered allspice, powdered ginger, salt, pepper
3 tablespoons butter
1/2 cup hot milk
% teaspoon salt
1/2 teaspoon white pepper
1/2 cup champagne or dry white wine
4-ounce can button mushrooms, drained

Have the butcher slice the steaks thin and pound them to a pulp texture. Spread the steaks with the softened butter and dredge them lightly with flour. Mix together the shrimp, lobster, cheeses, chives, pimientos and seasonings. Place a portion of the filling on each steak, roll up, and place, seam side down, in a single layer in a buttered baking dish. (If using canned abalone, split them in half and sandwich the filling between the halves; eliminate the butter and flour coating.) Make a sauce by melting the 3 tablespoons butter in a saucepan over medium heat. Add 3 tablespoons flour and stir until smooth. Gradually add the milk and cook, stirring constantly, until thickened. Add salt, pepper and champagne or wine. Cook 3 minutes longer. Remove from heat, add mushrooms and pour over the abalone. Bake in a 350° oven for 25 minutes, then place under the broiler until lightly browned.

Bishop DeWolfe’s Dinner for 6

James Perrette DeWolfe, Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, traces his lifelong interest in cooking to his childhood in Kansas City. “My mother was a great cook,” says the Bishop, “and I’m still using many of her recipes.” He also draws on a library of five to six hundred cook books, is currently working on one of his own, to be called “From the Bishop’s Kitchen.” Bishop DeWolfe counts cooking as one of his two relaxations (the other is fishing), practices it for clergy and friends in his Port Jefferson, N. Y., summer home with everyone in the kitchen kibitzing, and at outdoor barbecues in his official residence or for an occasional special dinner of the Gourmet Club to which he belongs.

William Holzhauser's
Dinner for 8

William Holzhauser's cooking apprenticeship started at an early age; as a child, he frequently took over in the kitchen. Later, as both he and his wife worked on newspapers (he was managing editor of the Los Angeles Mirror until its demise, now in public relations), he just naturally kept on doing the cooking. In Mr. Holzhauser's opinion a sense of showmanship is as essential to the cook as a sense of taste—every menu should have a surprise or a story behind it that will stimulate good conversation. To this end he limits his guests to the number his table can comfortably seat, twelve to fourteen, and serves Kirshel Brut champagne rather than cocktails as an aperitif, preferring to spend time at the table over the food and wine rather than dissipating it in an extended cocktail hour.

Soufflé Orientale

11-ounce can mandarin oranges
1 1/4 cups sugar
1 cup preserved kumquats in heavy syrup
1-pound, 13-ounce can peach halves, well drained
1 tablespoon lemon juice
3 tablespoons grated orange rind
1 tablespoon butter
1 tablespoon Grand Marnier
9 egg whites, at room temperature
1 teaspoon cream of tartar
1 cup heavy cream

Combine the mandarin oranges and their juice and 1 1/4 cups sugar in a saucepan. Bring to a boil over high heat, stirring frequently, and boil until the syrup spins a thread. Add the kumquats, peaches, lemon juice and orange rind and purée the mixture, a portion at a time, in an electric blender. Chill well. Butter two 6-cup soufflé dishes, dust each dish with 1 tablespoon sugar, and sprinkle the Grand Marnier over the bottom of the dishes. (Preparation up to this point may be done in advance.)

Preheat the oven to 400° 30 minutes before serving time. Beat the egg whites until foamy, add the cream of tartar and continue beating until stiff. Thoroughly fold half the whites into 3 1/2 cups of the fruit purée (reserve balance of purée and use as sauce for ice cream), then lightly fold in the remaining egg whites. Pour the soufflé mixture into the dishes and bake for 22 to 25 minutes. Whip the cream until stiff with the remaining sugar and place in a serving bowl. Serve the soufflé on warm plates. Pass the cream separately.

Dr. J. Harold Wayland's
Seventeenth-Century
Dinner for 6

Dr. J. Harold Wayland's interest in gastronomy led him to the specialized field of seventeenth-century English cookery, now his main preoccupation. Professor of Engineering Science at the California Institute of Technology, Dr. Wayland occasionally likes to prepare literary menus for the diversion of his guests. Here he has selected a Gargantuan dinner cited as "noble and enough" by Samuel Pepys, and reduced and adapted it to present-day proportions and tastes. The recipe for boiled chicken was culled from Dr. and Mrs. Wayland's book "Of Carving, Cards and Cookery," a hand-printed collector's item based on seventeenth-century cook books and playing cards; the original called for an ox bladder, which Dr. Wayland dryly notes "is not normally available in the average city market." Dr. Wayland credits Americans with being "the most gastronomically adventurous people in the Western world," a point he proves with the following menu.

2 teaspoons salt
1 large onion, peeled and quartered
2 stalks celery with leaves
5 sprigs thyme
Flour

Salt the chicken inside and out. Place the onion, celery and thyme in the body cavity. Dip in water a cucumber sack or piece of muslin large enough to enclose the chicken easily. Ring it out and pat the inside surface with enough flour to coat it completely. Shake off excess flour. Place the chicken in the cloth or sack, secure with string and immerse in a large soup kettle of rapidly boiling unsalted water. (It is important that the salt for seasoning the chicken and the broth all be in the interior of the bag. The hot water quickly cooks the layer of flour, making a semi-permeable membrane which acts very much as does the covering of an ox bladder in the original recipe.) Cover the kettle, reduce heat to medium and cook for 1 1/2 to 3 hours, depending on the age of the chicken. Remove the bag of chicken immediately, open it in a large bowl to catch the broth from inside the bag. Serve immediately.

Edward Weintal's

Edward Weintal, diplomatic correspondent of Newsweek, believes that there is no better eating in America than the regional foods, especially seafood. On summer weekends, he invites a mixed group of six to twenty guests (foreign ambassadors often rub shoulders with local oyster fishermen) to his house in St. Mary's County, southeastern Maryland, and feasts them on locally grown corn on the cob, crabs he catches in the nearby creeks or the delicious local oysters which he either bakes on a grill over an outdoor fire or simply serves on the half shell.

Baked Crabs Southern Maryland

About 24 large live crabs or 2 pounds lump crab meat
2 slices white bread, crusts removed
1/2 cup milk
1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce
1 tablespoon dry sherry
1/2 teaspoon Tabasco
2 tablespoons Goldin's prepared mustard
4 tablespoons softened butter
Dash cayenne pepper
2 eggs, lightly beaten

To cook live crabs, fill a large kettle to a depth of 2" with beer, vinegar or salted water (1 tablespoon salt to each quart of water). Bring to a rolling boil, add the crabs, cover tightly and bring to a boil again. Cook until the shells are bright red, about 15 minutes from time water boils. Cool the crabs, crack the claws and remove the tops of the shells. Remove the lump crab meat from the claws and the 2 areas underneath the top shells where the large lump is found. (For this dish, do not use other meat remaining in the crab. It contains more cartilage, and the meat will be shredded.) If you are using lump crab meat, pick it over and discard the cartilage.

Soak the bread in the milk and mash with a fork. Add remaining ingredients, fold in the crab meat and mound in 6 crab shells or similar large shells. Bake in a 400° oven for 20 minutes.

Maurice Brockway's
Bucks County Dinner for 6

Maurice Brockway's interest in food is both professional and personal. As catering manager of New York's Sheraton East Hotel he plans menus and banquets for any number up to 1,000 guests. At home, he likes to give weekend parties for no more than ten in the restored pre-Revolutionary Bucks County, Pa., house he bought last fall. An enthusiastic and serious cook, Mr. Brockway seeks out and serves local Pennsylvania Dutch specialties—pork loin smoked a few miles from the house, sun-dried corn which makes a delectable pudding. "I've heard," says Mr. Brockway, "that we even have a local wine, but until I try it, I'll stick with the classic and unbeatable wine for pork—champagne."

1/2 cup (packed) dark brown sugar
1 teaspoon powdered cloves
1 1/2 cups warm hard cider or applejack

Remove pork from refrigerator, spread the fat side with a mixture of the brown sugar and cloves and let stand until meat is at room temperature. Place the pork in a shallow roasting pan and roast uncovered in a preheated 300° oven for 1 1/2 hours, basting with cider or applejack at 15 minute intervals. Remove pork to a serving platter. Skim fat from pan, add 1/2 cup water, heat to boiling point, and pour into a sauceboat. Serve separately. Serve with horseradish-applesauce and dried corn pudding or fresh or canned corn pudding.

Transfer the fish to a serving platter. Scatter the reserved almonds over the fish, spoon a small amount of butter sauce over the top and pass the remaining sauce in a sauceboat.

To serve, degrease the sides and serve fish on a platter, pour sauce over, and chill. Serve in the jellied sauce, with Madeira.

Jerome Hill's Summer Luncheon for 6

Jerome Hill, artist and filmmaker, came to cooking by way of wines. Mr. Hill keeps his fine collection of wines at his house in the ski region of Sugar Bowl, Calif., where the storage conditions are ideal. When he first started to cook, he experimented with canned goods, but finding the results did not live up to his cellar, he persuaded the gourmet-cook wives of his friends to teach him the fine points of cuisine. Although Mr. Hill's menus are relatively simple, they are also subtle and much influenced by the relationship of wine and food. In fact, when he plans a menu, he always starts with the wine or wines he wishes to serve and then chooses dishes that will complement and enhance them.

1/2 cup dry vermouth
1/2 cup Madeira
3 pounds sole or flounder fillets
Salt, ground white pepper

Melt 2 tablespoons butter in a small skillet over medium heat. Add almonds and sauté, stirring constantly, until golden brown—about 2 to 3 minutes. Pour off the butter, reserve the almonds.

Bring the vermouth and Madeira to the simmering point in a large enameled skillet over medium heat. Sprinkle fillets with 1/2 teaspoon salt and a little pepper, add to skillet 2 or 3 at a time and poach for 2 minutes on one side. Then with a broad spatula, turn the fillets and poach 2 or 3 minutes longer, or until fish is opaque and firm to the touch. As fillets are poached, remove to a large platter and keep hot in a 250° oven. When all are cooked, measure the accumulated juices from the platter and pour back into the skillet. Stir in an equal amount of melted butter.

Vice-Admiral William J. Marshall's Dinner for 6

Vice-Admiral William J. Marshall, president of the Bourbon Institute, acquired a taste for foreign cuisine and a fabulous collection of copper cooking utensils during his naval tours of duty. Both are now put to good use in his home at Vienna, Va., where his leisure time is spent hunting and cooking. The results often take on a truly international flavor: local venison steeped in a marinade containing Chinese Hoisin Sauce and native American bourbon, a surprisingly successful collaboration.

COFFEE

Roast Saddle of Venison, Kentucky Sauce

1/2 cup Hoisin Sauce (available at oriental food specialty shops)
1/2 cup honey
1/2 cup tomato paste
1 1/2 cup bourbon whiskey
1 small clove garlic, crushed
1/2 teaspoon minced fresh ginger root, or 1/2 teaspoon powdered ginger
1 teaspoon soy sauce
6 to 8 pounds saddle of venison, preferably from a young buck

Thin slices of salt pork

Kentucky Sauce

Mix together the first 7 ingredients. Pour over the venison and marinate for 48 hours, turning the meat occasionally. Remove the venison from the marinade and place it in a shallow roasting pan. Cover the top with salt pork, and insert a meat thermometer in a fleshy part of the meat, making sure it does not rest on a bone. Roast in a preheated 325° oven, basting frequently with the marinade, until the thermometer registers rare. (If the animal is older, adjust cooking time accordingly.) Discard the pork and serve with a sauceboat of Kentucky Sauce passed separately.

Combine 1/2 cup dry red wine, 1 tablespoon bourbon whiskey, 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, 3/4 cup tart black-currant jelly and 3/4 teaspoon salt in a saucepan. Heat, stirring constantly, until the jelly melts. Blend 1 teaspoon flour with 1/2 cup sour cream, add to the sauce and cook, stirring constantly, until thickened.

Renny Saltzman's

Renny Saltzman, a New York interior designer, does most of his cooking and entertaining in summer when he and his wife move out to Long Island. (In winter, he may go to cooking school to brush up on techniques.) Mr. Saltzman's favorite menu is one that allows plenty of latitude for long, lazy afternoons at the beach—an easy first course, fresh local vegetables that need a minimum of preparation and a main dish that can be three-quarters cooked in the morning, finished in minutes.

16 thin slices leg of veal, pounded flat

9 tablespoons butter

1/2 cup brandy

2 teaspoons finely chopped garlic

3 large tomatoes, peeled, seeded and coarsely chopped

1 teaspoon tomato paste

1 teaspoon meat glaze

1 1/2 cups chicken stock

Salt, freshly cracked white pepper

1/2 cups heavy sour cream

1 pound mushrooms, sliced 1/4" thick and sautéed in butter

3/4 cup freshly grated Parmesan cheese

Dredge the meat lightly with flour. Melt 5 tablespoons butter in a large, heavy pan over high heat. Brown the meat, a few slices at a time, for 2 to 3 minutes on each side. Return all veal to pan, heat the brandy and flambé the veal. Remove veal and set aside in a warm place. To the pan juices, add 2 tablespoons butter, the garlic and 3/4 of the chopped tomatoes. Cook briskly for 2 minutes. Reduce heat to medium. Blend in 3 level tablespoons flour, the tomato paste and meat glaze, stirring until smooth. Gradually add the stock, stirring constantly, and cook until thickened. Add salt and pepper to taste. Replace the veal in the pan and bake uncovered on the top shelf of a 375° oven for 40 minutes, basting occasionally with the sauce.

Remove from the oven. Transfer veil to an au gratin dish. Add remaining tomatoes to the sauce, then slowly stir in the sour cream. Add 1/3 of the mushrooms. Pour the sauce over the veal and replace in the oven for 5 minutes. Remove from the oven and scatter the remaining mushrooms on top. Sprinkle the surface of the sauce with cheese, dot with the remaining butter and brown under a hot broiler.

John G. Martin, chairman of Heublein Inc., is also a sportsman, a raiser of game birds (at his Connecticut home, Johnnycake Farm) and a fine amateur cook. Many of his menus take advantage of fresh-caught or home-grown ingredients (he also has a fine blueberry patch) prepared simply but with style. A great experimenter with recipes, Mr. Martin finds Heublein imports often add that extra-special flavor he is looking for—vide the Avocado Bristol Fashion with Harvey's Dry Sherry.

1 tablespoon salt

1 tablespoon whole peppercorns

7- to 10-pound whole Atlantic salmon, cleaned

Lloyd Bryan's
Barbecue Party for 20

Lloyd Bryan's bête noire is, literally, a roast that is black on the outside, gray for an inch or so, then pink and finally blue at the center. According to Mr. Bryan this is the direct result of fast cooking. He is a pioneer in the art of low-temperature, slow, enclosed roasting which he learned from Southern Negro cooks twenty-five years ago, now practices at his Napa, Calif., home. Mr. Bryan, a retired engineer, even invented his own outdoor table-type covered barbecue. Says Mr. Bryan, "I have converted a lot of backyard cooks to my leisure style of cooking and none of them would go back to the old method once they have graduated from the short-order class." He proves his theory with the menu below, shown in action at an outdoor party (see page 101), and in his carving of the pig served at the party.

Roast Suckling Pig

25-pound suckling pig (dressed weight)

4 teaspoons salt

1 teaspoon white pepper

1 large loaf stale white bread, crumbled

3/4 teaspoon cinnamon

1 pound prunes, cooked, pitted and drained

7 medium-sized red Delicious apples

2 cranberries or maraschino cherries

Avocado or other decorative leaves

Tangerines or persimmons

As this slow method of cooking a pig takes about 10 hours, light the fire early in the morning. Using charcoal or briquets, make a fire 18" long and 12" wide in a large covered barbecue. Let the pig come to room temperature. Remove all excess fat from the cavity of the pig and sprinkle it, inside and out, with 3 teaspoons salt and 3/4 teaspoon pepper. Add enough water to the bread just to moisten it, season it with the cinnamon, remaining salt and pepper. Fill cavity of pig with prunes, 6 of the apples, cored and quartered, and the seasoned bread mixture. Sew up the openings or secure them with skewers.

Truss the pig by pulling the legs forward and tying in place. (Tie the cord to the ankles on one side, pass the cord tightly over the back or nose and tie to the opposite ankle.) Insert a 2-inch cube of wood in the mouth. Remove the eyes and replace them with 1/4" wooden pegs. Cure the tail and skewer it in place. Butter the ears and tail. Insert a meat thermometer in one thigh, but do not allow it to rest on a bone.

Crinkle a 24" square piece of heavy-duty aluminum foil, press it flat, then fold it over to form a pad approximately 12" by 24". Lay this pad on the grill and cover with another piece of... foil, about 16" wide and 30" long. Turn up the edges to form a pan in which to catch the drip­pings. Carefully place the pig on the foil. Lower the fire about 12" to 14" from the grill, close the grill cover and adjust the lower vent for a slow fire. Cook for 10 hours at 225° to 275°, or until the meat thermometer registers 185°. Baste occasionally with the pan drippings. Remove the excess with a basting syringe, but leave ¼" drippings in the pan at all times.

To serve, drain off all the drippings. Remove the pig in its foil to a large board or platter. Replace the eye plugs with cranberries or maras­simos, occasionally with the pan dripping. Remove the fire. Cook for 10 hours at from 225° to 275°, or until the meat thermometer registers 185°.

To carve, slice the skin down the center of the back and slice the meat as required (for carving technique, see page 112).

Note: This method of cooking gives a delight­fully tender and delicious result. Lacking a cov­ered barbecue, you can follow a standard recipe for oven-roasting the pig.

Edward Fields, creator of custom carpets, began “rolling around with eggs” twenty-eight years ago when, as the earliest riser in the household, he started making his own breakfast. Now Mr. Fields’ egg dishes are the main attraction at informal, friendly weekend brunches. Mr. Fields, who likes to be part of his own parties, urges his friends to help themselves to food, mix the Bloody Marys and Screwdrivers. “I hate being a host,” he admits, “and my friends seem to get a kick out of hosting me in my own house.”

Edward Giobbi’s
Italian Dinner for 8
Edward Giobbi, an expressionist artist whose paintings hang in many American museums, dates his love of cooking to his art-student years in Italy when he first became acquainted, through relatives, with true Italian provincial cooking. By ob­serving and writing down what he saw, Mr. Giobbi built up a fund of regional recipes, now prepares both these and improvisations of his own at his home in Katonah, N. Y. (The chicken with mus­sels is his own invention inspired by an old fish recipe from the Abruzzi region of Italy; the salad is also an Abruzzi specialty.) He not only finds cooking as creative as painting, akin in the rela­tionship of form, texture and color, but also an enjoyable relaxation after a day in the studio.

Ted Nierenberg’s
Summer Luncheon for 10
Ted Nierenberg, president of Dansk Designs, likes to allot a part of his traveling and leisure time to recipe sleuthing. He notes down any espe­cially interesting dish he has tasted and, back in his own Long Island kitchen, checks cook books and adds, subtracts or changes recipe ingredients until, through improvisation, he arrives at a per­fect original result which then becomes part of his repertoire. Mr. Nierenberg plans and times his menus so that good conversation can continue without the meal being ruined. For a summer luncheon, the cold soup and dessert are prepared ahead, the cheese soufflé to the point where it can go in the oven as the last guest arrives.

Alfred Rosenthal's
Dinner for 6

Alfred Rosenthal, a vice president of Paragon Art and Linen Co., owes his skill in the kitchen to chance and a friendly chef. While working as a waiter in a small Catskills hotel during school vacations, he was given the opportunity to place a kitchen drop-out and absorb the principles of French cooking. Today he uses classic recipes as a guide, adapting them to his own style and taste, finds this a stimulating talking point for his weekend parties. Mr. Rosenthal limits his formal dinners to six or eight guests, which allows him to plan interesting menus and the kind of dishes—notably honed and stuffed Cornish hens, soufflés and crépes—that do not lend themselves to quantity cooking.

2 tablespoons minced parsley
6 thin slices prosciutto or sugar-cured ham
6 strips California Jack cheese (or mild soft brick cheese), 4" by 1/2" by 1/2"

Floor
2 eggs, lightly beaten with a little milk
Seasoned bread crumbs
Peanut oil for deep frying
Truffled Champagne Sauce

Split chicken breasts in half and skin and bone them, leaving only the main wing bone attached to the chicken. Put each half between 2 pieces of waxed paper and pound until it is a scant 1/4" thick. Brush inside of each half breast with the butter and sprinkle with the salt, pepper and parsley. Sprinkle a little sautéed mushroom on one end of each ham slice, cover with a strip of cheese, and roll the ham loosely around the cheese. Place each ham-and-cheese strip on a dish, secure by tucking in end opposite the wing bone. Arrange on platter and garnish with parsley. Serve with Truffled Champagne Sauce, passed separately.

Melt 6 tablespoons butter in an enameled saucepan over low heat. Add the flour and stir with a wooden spoon for 3 minutes, or until the roux is golden. Meanwhile, heat the stock to the boiling point. Remove the roux from the heat. When it stops bubbling, add the stock gradually, beating with a wire whisk until smooth. Return to heat and cook for 3 minutes. Add the Tabasco, Maggi and champagne or vermouth to taste. (Each time you add a little champagne, allow sauce to cook for 1 minute before tasting.) Chop the truffles and stir into the sauce with their juice. Just before serving, remove the boiling sauce from the heat and whisk in the frozen butter, bit by bit.

Fred Caligiuri's business is also his pleasure. As president of Spice Islands Co., his working days are spent in an aromatic atmosphere of herbs, spices and the subtle seasoning blends for which his company is noted. HOW TO CARVE
SUCKLING PIG

Suckling pig, a delicacy well known in Spain and Latin America, has an ardent if limited following here. Lloyd Bryan of Napa, Calif., whose mastery of outdoor hostmanship is shown in the party on page 100, recommends suckling pig for this kind of large summer barbecue. “Pig is a very rich beast,” says Mr. Bryan, “and should not be served too often, but it is wonderfully spectacular.” His special way of cooking the pig slowly on an enclosed grill results in a rich mahogany skin and succulent flesh that yields to the knife. Frequently Mr. Bryan cooks the pig on a plywood plank which later, camouflaged by leaves and flowers, acts as platter and carving board. Recipe and menu on page 108.

CORKSCREW

In response to H.H.G's queries on hostmanship, our consultants spoke out firmly about two traditionally male provinces:

The Cellar and the Bar

No matter where they lived, how they entertained or how large or small a part they played in the actual preparation of a party, all of our armchair experts jealously guarded that masculine prerogative, the care, choice and serving of wines and liquors. As our own specialist, James Beard, puts it, "Retaining control of home bartending is not just a matter of prestige. It's also a matter of taste. I do not mean only the good taste of propriety, but the good taste of what goes into your mouth."

Pre-dinner Drinking

The attitude of our consultants to the amount of time given to pre-dinner drinking was summed up by one outspoken host.

ROBERT BROOKER: "The only thing I really object to are those long, long cocktail hours, when you're invited for seven o'clock and you eat at ten. It spoils your food."

On the subject of what to serve, opinions ranged far and wide.

ALFRED HITCHCOCK: "If you're having a really gourmet dinner, you should not have any hard liquor at all—you're better off with a little wine or champagne."

WHITFIELD MARSHALL: "You should never confine people to any one kind of drink. If your party's going to be good, you should make everyone happy."

TED NIERENBERG: "We tried to cut out hard liquor before dinner, but it's impossible to do that in this country without being rude to your guests."

Wine and Wisdom

When it came to wine, our consultants really waxed eloquent. To them the relationship between the meal and the wines that accompany it was of first importance, and they were willing to put a lot of time and thought into scouting, tasting and matching the wine to the dish. Californians were particularly enterprising and artful on the subject.

J. HAROLD WAYLAND: "One of my pet peeves is the snobbery—much more prevalent in the eastern part of the U.S. than in California—which deprecates American wines. I have set a rule that I never buy a wine from a company that systematically refuses to use vintage-year labels unless I can taste the particular wine before buying any quantity and can be assured that every bottle of the wine I am buying is from the same lot as the bottle I tasted. And this keeps some pretty well-advertised wines out of my cellar. But I never have to be ashamed of the wines I serve."

WILLIAM HOILZHAUSER: "We serve both California and French wines, but never try to pit one against the other. It is true, of course, that many of the California wines frequently win out in comparative tastings. However, who can say which is best? Because of difference in climate, soil and methods, each remains a gift from God."

ALFRED HITCHCOCK: "There are certain things that bother me about entertaining. My conscience bothers me when I think I'm wasting good wine by having it swilled down by the uninitiated. On the other hand, if I give them a modest wine which they are enjoying extremely well, my conscience bothers me because I haven't given of my best. I never know what to do about it."

The Parting Cup

The subject of post-prandial imbibing didn't evoke the controversy of pre-dinner drinking. All our hosts seemed to be agreed that this was no more than a nice way to round off the evening.

ALFRED ROSENTHAL: "After dinner I don't care what anyone drinks. I serve brandy and liqueurs, but they can have Scotch if they like."

FRANCIS TAUSIG, publishing executive: "If you serve drinks after dinner, you ought to have a choice of three or four things: something sweet that women like, such as crème de menthe; some really good brandy and perhaps Drambuie or B & B; or a good Stinger that will really take care of everything."
you can buy laces and embroidery at Mulebach & Birrer, on Kappelplatz, and you'll feed well—especially off lake trout—at the Wilden Mann. With time on your hands, explore the lake by paddle steamer and visit the little places such as Kissnacht am Rigi or Trieschen, where Wagner's house has been converted into a museum.

Mountain resorts

German, French or Italian culture superimposed on the Swiss shows up as clearly in a mountain resort as in a large city—for instance, the south-central Alpine towns of Grindelwald in the German-speaking Bernese Oberland, and Crans-sur-Sierre, in the adjacent French-speaking Valais. Grindelwald is a small, typically gemütlich village, enjoyable at any time of year. It lies in the shadow of the Eiger's north face and to wake up in the traditional early morning mist, step onto your bedroom balcony and watch the clouds wreath and dissolve and clear, in minutes, from the black face of the mountain is an experience of quite unearthly beauty. But the real sensation is to take a mountain railroad up to the Kleine Scheidegg pass, which has an equally stupendous view at a -lady dizzying altitude.

Utterly different is the Swiss-French resort of Crans, now considered by the knowing to be more chic than St. Moritz. Crans has all the Gallic earmarks: Parisian hairdressers, ties from Carven and high-priced French and Italian boutiques. But in spite of Dior and high-priced French and Italian boutiques. But in spite of lingerie, the place offers some simple pleasures. I was taken to the Cervin, a log hut restaurant where the dish of the house is raclette. A side of cheese is toasted before a brazier of pine cones, the melted part then scraped, sizzling, onto your plate with the accompaniment of gherkins and a boiled potato. The whole thing is helped along with prodigious quantities of French wine, followed by another and then another scraping of the hot cheese. Such evenings begin at nine and continue into the small hours, for this leisurely meal of protracted snacking has the same effect upon people's loquacity as an Arab meze. It is a good formula for informal country entertaining, and well worth getting the pine cones for the fire. You may not be able to buy the special Swiss cheeses (bagnes and conches) but you can compromise with any hard, dry cheese that has a good crust to it—the crust, when slightly scorched, is delicious.

Also at Cervin, I had one of the many versions of résti. This dish is simplicity itself to prepare. Boil some potatoes whole in their skins, and, before they are quite cooked, peel them. Slice finely, and lay flat to fill a heavy frying pan. Pour a little olive oil over the top, plus a squeeze of lemon juice and lots of salt and ground pepper. Fry until crisp on one side only, and then cut into wedges to serve.

The Italian region

The twin lakeside resorts of Locarno, heading the Swiss part of Lake Maggiore, and Lugano, on the lake of the same name, represent Switzerland's spearheads into southern Europe. Suddenly, all is Italianate languor and sath calm and cypress trees, a milky opalescent light replacing the sharp, stupendous clarity of the north. I was there in October, when the sky was blue and clear and it was still warm enough to sit outside over

H&G'S GARDENER'S

Garden husbandry—
9 ways to improve it

While the word husbandry was long ago put up for grabs by both men and women, the lexicographers still leave it a slightly masculine ring. This is undoubtedly a good thing. How otherwise could you describe appropriately the special kind of housekeeping skill that men gardeners seem to exhibit more strikingly and more often (when they exhibit it at all) than most women gardeners do? To say that good husbandry is becoming to a man scarcely defines it. But rather than attempt a definition, we prefer to list some of the skills and practices good husbandry involves and suggest ways to improve them. You will see a few specifics across the bottom of these pages. Here are nine basic recommendations for upgrading your husbandry.

1. Understand the true nature of your garden earth. The most important single thing for the gardener to bear in mind when he considers the ground in which he intends to make a garden is that—whatever its original nature—the soil must be converted into a highly specialized blend of sand and clay (decomposed rock), and of organic matter (mostly decayed vegetation). The gardener's true intent should not be to simulate nature but to improve on it. What with the complex requirements of ornamental landscape trees, shrubs and other plants, natural soils would be wholly unequal to the task for more than a season or two on the average small home landscape. Constant renewal of what, in the past, H&G has often referred to as "gardener's loam" is essential. This means not only putting on annual supplements of compost or leafmold but also maintaining a proper balance of mineral and organic matter, of clay, sand or just plain dirt. Good husbandry will dictate that a bale or two of compost pile will be ready to yield a bushel or so of fibrous plant compost, that a shovelful of sand will always be available to add grit—to fluffy earth. Mere availability is not enough. They should be used.

2. Learn and satisfy the requirements of your plants. In the first five months of this year, H&G dwelt at some length on the great forces that influence plant growth. The good husbandman provides for each of his plants the kind of light, air, soil, moisture and orientation that will enable it to do its best. Books and magazine articles can put these into words. But only the truly interested gardener can translate the words into superior plant performance. As the virtuoso told the aspiring violinist who wanted to know how to score a hit at Carnegie Hall: practice. You can be a good gardener by practicing by the book. You can become a very good gardener only by working at it. This is not as hard as it sounds and is a lot more fun.

3. Step up to a better variety whenever you replace a plant. Sometimes a plant dies over winter and must be replaced. Sometimes a good plant turns out to have been put in the wrong location. Sometimes an entirely new planting is called for either by the working out of a good landscape scheme or by the whim of the perpetrator. In whatever case, the good husbandman—mindful of the inexorable rule that to hold even is to slip backwards—will plant an improved plant whenever he gets a chance. This may be anything from substituting known species for a nondescript one (even that can be a step up) to the substitution of a fine holly with proved fruit-bearing qualities for one of the same species with indifferent berries. Consult good mail-order lists and nursery specialists. No bargain or "wonder plants" need apply.

4. Use plants to enhance everyday life. You don't garden in a vacuum—at least most people don't, even men. And a good garden can be a fine adornment to the busiest kind of modern living. This is largely a matter of good planning and common sense. It does not mean that you must confine yourself to flower borders or foundation plantings. Every part of a good garden may contribute to your family's total enjoyment. And fine collections of choice and well-chosen plants can lift everybody's spirit as much as and in the same way fine paintings do.

5. Plan landscapes for greatest sensory appeal. This won't mean much until you stop to think about it. Then you will realize that what we have in mind are such things as these: flowers that stay open at night; plants that have fragrant foliage as well as flowers; thick turf that is fun to walk on, a variety of textures in paths and walks; well-placed sculpture (not too much) at strategic points; the sound as well as the sight of moving water; trees and shrubs that offer a new show—of flowers, foliage, fruit or all three—as the seasons change; a landscape plan that offers surprise and stimulation along with restful peace.

6. Let others share your garden's enjoyment. Only the very irascible or the very eccentric will shut their friends out of their gardens. Pride alone can make hospitality a pleasure. Unless the exigencies of raising a certain kind of plant material make it impossible, provide for the enjoyment of your friends, don't merely suffer them. Gardening may be considered a happy accompaniment to either solitude or gregariousness. It is scarcely necessary to add that this is more than providing benches where visitors can rest their feet.

7. Make sure your plants grow as well as they know how. If this smacks of anthropomorphism, rest assured that even the humblest plant seems to sense when it is being short-changed in matters of light, nutrition, moisture or improper planting. And even plants that are given all the routine care the rule books call for will respond, so help us, to the TLC: that a good doctor or nurse knows is so important to the care of ill children. It is not alone what the knowledgeable gardener does for his plants that makes the difference, but how he does it—and above all, when he does it. In fact, if we had to pick a sixth sense for gardeners, it would be the sense of timing. So when you add the needed dose of plant food, do it at the right time. Don't water your lawn until it really needs it; then water it—and liberally. When you cut a branch, make sure you know what the eventual effect will be—and that you want that effect. In a sense, the good husbandman is as zealous in husbanding his plant's resources as his own.

8. Risk part of your annual garden budget on new plants and seeds. This is no risk, really. It comes under the head of research and development—as necessary to the well-run garden as to orbital flight. While plant hybridizing is undoubtedly a business in its most effective application, it is a venture business. All of your modern roses, most of your prettiest rhododendrons, many of your loveliest lilacs, the most pest-resistant of suburban street trees and virtually all the blight-resistant fruits and vegetables were the result of informed guesses or patient experiment. The gardener who wishes to excel will be no less aware of the possibilities inherent in new plant groupings, improved foliage forms, more floriferous or colorful displays. This could mean many dollars a year. It could also mean fifty cents.

9. Increase your time for gardening by reducing drudgery. To the aficionado, garden work is not work. But also to the aficionado, time is of the essence—and there is never enough of it. So even though you enjoy chopping weeds or trimming edges, beware such luxuries. There are more important things for the gardener to do. So put first things first—or at least second.

FERTILIZE FREELY (roses, left) for best performance. Most garden varieties of ornamental plants simply will not excel unless cared for like thoroughbreds. PROTECT FROM PESTS, center, and that doesn't always mean to spray against insects. Netting keeps birds from slashing these 'Baron Solemacher' strawberries. KEEP A NEAT HOUSE—or in this case, right, a tidy utility space. Incidental asset is the heavy-duty wheelbarrow.

---

Let Davey "summerize" your trees now!

"Summerize" — an important midsummer Davey check-up of your trees to forestall damage, disease. And now's the time to do it!

For now is the crucial time when every overlooked dead branch is an invitation to disease-bearing insects. Expert removal of infected wood could save your tree. And what better time for Davey experts, with the latest techniques and equipment, to brace old limbs heavy with full foliage. (A rough summer storm could be disastrous.) Weak V-shaped forks should be cabled and strengthened now, too. And deep-root feeding, using special tree food developed for exclusive use by Davey experts, could bring your trees renewed vigor and loneliness long before leaf-fall time.

NEW DAVEY SERVICE—LAWN FEEDING While Davey men are caring for your trees, let them feed your lawn, too. Special Da-V-Green Lawn Food can give your lawn the renewed growth, deep color and rich beauty that make lawns outstanding.

Second weekend

Real spadework. Double digging is all but a lost art. Yet, by no other means can a topnotch flower border be so well fitted to receive such long-lived perennials as peonies, oriental poppies, dicentas, astilbe and roses, or such demanding bulbs and tubers as lilies and dahlias. There is nothing mysterious about the theory of double digging: you take out one layer of soil to a spade's depth, then take out the layer underneath, then put the first layer back and spread the second layer on top. But in practice this is not quite as easy as it sounds. The difficulty comes in handling the spade dexterously enough to keep the soil from sliding back into the trench as you move backwards to dig the next spadel. And nothing but practice will teach you how to do it successfully. You can think about it until you are purple in the face, but until you try it, you simply won't know what a trick it can be. Nor how satisfying once you have mastered it. As we said, for really deep soil preparation (up to 18 inches if you are adept) there is nothing to compare with this procedure. Especially if you incorporate com-

Notes for July Gardeners

In some cases the triumph of mind over muscle is simply the triumph of muscle

First weekend

Power play. The power lawn mower and the power tiller are operated these days by almost everyone in the family. But there are still many heavy-duty appliances, available for purchase or for rental, that are wholly unsafe for any but a careful and able-bodied male to use. Heavy tillers, all mold-board plows, most tractor-drawn earth-moving utensils and, above all, portable chain saws should never be operated by anyone without previous supervised experience in handling such machines. So much for the general, and emphatic, caveat. On the positive side, a chain saw, for example, will fell more trees and cut more cordwood in an hour than any two amateur handymen could accomplish in a full day's toil. The romance will be missing, the racket will be excruciating, the risks of careless handling will be very real, but so will the results of well-directed effort.

To fell a tree—even a smallish one—requires a knock that approaches art. And muscle as well. Certainly if you are going to fell a tree over 25 feet tall, you will hire a specialist. For the rest, while the knack of using a chain saw is really not hard to learn, you may do as well to hire an itinerant sawyer. He will work faster, make less mess and do all the risks. But he will cost more, probably, than if you hire a saw from a tool rental concern (the countryside is full of them) and do the work yourself. If you have used a chain saw before, you are probably quite capable of doing your own work. To cut more than a cord of wood (a pile of 4-foot logs that measures 4 by 8 feet or the equivalent), you will need help unless you are in tip-top physical shape. But all concerned should remember that a working chain saw is like a loaded gun. It shoots where you aim it.

Every reader's ploy: Far from inconsequential, though not likely to shake the world, is Janet Gillespie's delightful new book, "The Joy of a Small Garden" (Dodd-Mead, $3.75). Actually what the book communicates is the joy of a gardener who has a sense of humor and a wonderful way with growing things. Touched on are such subjects as planning, transplanting, mind-changing, people-wheeling, husband-rearing, budget-balancing and other horticultural performances. A lovely book—taken either all at once or in pre-sleep chapters. (For one chapter, on plant scrounging, see HaG, May, 1963.)
post or other organic matter in the bottom layer before you cover it.

Books again. Two on the all-important subject of woody landscape plants deserve mention. James Bush-Brown’s “Shrubs and Trees for the Home Landscape” (Chilton, $5.95) is a disappointingly pedestrian formalization, in tabular arrangement, of available information. From this author, it seems unwontedly routine, though accurate enough. Robert Clark’s “Flowering Trees” (Van Nostrand, $6.50) is a far better if more limited work. The judgments are discerning and helpful as well as completely authoritative. If the prose is less than deathless, at least it is clear, simple and direct.

Stanley Schuler’s brisk and concise “1001 House Plant Questions Answered” (Van Nostrand, $5.95) puts a lot of practical information where it will do the most good—at your fingertips.

Third weekend

Leverage plus. An ordinary male, given a day away from his desk, can push 200-pound rocks around his garden without straining a muscle if he knows how to handle a crowbar—and if he has the muscle to begin with. To move weights you cannot readily lift, you must employ leverage. And like running a chain saw or double-digging a flower bed, this takes fully as much energy as skill. A good unabridged dictionary, or your memory of high school physics, will explain the theory of using a lever. All we would add here are a few simple pragmatic hints.

First, make sure any lever you employ is adequate to the task. Most planks, many 2-by-4’s and all tool handles are unde­pendable if not positively unsafe. One of wood, a piece of heavy pipe, or another rock. Third, keep your fulcrum well up under the forward end of your lever at all times, because that’s the way you get your best leverage. Fourth—and most important—move slowly. Never jerk or lunge, never let your feet get off the ground, and never let go of a bar that is “working.” One more point, having little to do with the others: you may find, perhaps to your surprise, that it’s easier to inch your burden forward slowly than to roll it over. Safer, too, sometimes. Above all, don’t be afraid to look lazy. Experienced workmen will understand, and the rest don’t count.

Counterirritant. Marjorie Johnson Dietz’s new “Concise Encyclopedia of Favorite Flowering Shrubs” (Doubleday, $4.95) is a worthy successor, in the realm of woody plants, to her earlier compilation of garden flowers that set the pattern of factual coverage and informed opinion.

Fourth weekend

On the level. There is nothing especially muscular about laying out a grade either with a surveyor’s instruments or a simple peep-sight level that you can buy at any hardware store and carry in your pocket. A child could do it. So could a woman. But only men ever do. (Atavism? Balboa on a peak in Darien? George Washington?) Major grading operations, on less than a professional scale, are infrequently required. But minor problems of contouring, path laying, wall and step construction, and terrace surfacing arise far more often than they are solved, if we make ourselves clear.

With the aid of a sight-level, three stakes and a mallet you can run grade lines, therefore measure and equalize slopes, with ease and something approximating dispatch. The idea, of course, is to sight to the top of your master or “home” stake to the top of another stake driven at some useful reference point to the same level as the first. Then, without disturbing the first stake, you can hedge-hop all over your landscape, measuring up or down by marking your second and third stakes by reference to your sighting level. If you wonder why we left the master stake way back there, it was so you can start over if you made a mistake or, more importantly, so you can check your measurements backwards to the starting point to make sure you did the job right. Back-checking and cross-checking (as, for example, making diagonal surveys across a broad slope) are an essential part of even the simplest kind of surveying. Your satisfaction when your work proves out will be out of all proportion to any minuscule engineering virtuosity you may have displayed.
Bag and baggage:

For the stag away

H&G's queries on how men like to live elicited the fact that today's traveling man—whether he goes stag or with his family, on business or vacation—packs his own suitcase. His luggage wardrobe, therefore, should include well-equipped cases that proclaim for themselves exactly the kind of trip they are meant for—overnight, over the weekend or over eighty days around the world. The suitcases on these pages are designed and fitted for every contingency: Himself could pack any one of them in a flash.

For an overnight business trip, any one of this quartet will carry a man's paper agenda, plus a change of linen, et al. The "Showcase" (flat) includes a detachable briefcase (Eastern Case Co., $30.75); the "Executive Flite" (standing on end) has a removable portfolio (T. Anthony, $137.50). Open for inspection (see below) are the "Diplomat" and the "Ready-Pack."

For a man who must keep well groomed for a week, a good-sized case that's well partitioned will neatly hold everything. Packing bars, hangers and pads (see below) keep three suits in the pink, with plenty of room for shirts, socks, etc., and toilet articles. The scuff-proof vinyl case has magnesium frame and nicely rounded corners. Oxford gray, brown, tan or olive. Samsonite, $49.50.

Zippered, waterproof gusset pockets of the "Slim Garment Pak," above, take good care of crushables such as shirts. Hung at its full 40-inch length, right, the "Pak" becomes a traveling closet. In far-flung places, where a hotel closet is no more than a peg on the wall, this bag could be a godsend.

All prices given include 10 per cent Federal tax whenever it is applicable.

When a man sets off on a three- or four-week journey, he would do well to take both hang-up suitcase and duffel. The "B-4 Bag," left above, holds four suits and everything to go with them. In olive brown or black vinyl lined with beige twill. Mark Cross, $87.45. The tall duffel bag—made by the same firm, in the same colors, same vinyl—is $27.50.

A reasonable Beau Brummell bound for Hong Kong—and on and on from there—might choose to pack a capacious hang-up bag (see it open, below) and a matching suitcase of leather-trimmed canvas, $85.25 and $63.25 respectively. In the United States, he might pack a small cowhide case fitted with pill vials ($7.50) and a zippered cowhide case for toiletries ($12.65). All, T. Anthony. He can add a leather stud case ($11, Mark Cross).

Open, the "Jumbo Air Pack," right, is a kind of canvas armoire that holds eight suits. A properly designed book fits over the top of any door, a slide bar locks all hangars to prevent suits from slipping. Mar­supially, the pack is equipped with two pockets (removable, zippered cases with handles) that can go traveling on their own. This Adorable Crichton is to be had in blue or green plaid, solid red, blue, black or brown: Whatever the color, the trim is a complementary shade.

A boom to the man who wants to bring home a plenty of treasure from his trip is a carryall, left, that starts out folded into a 10-by-17-inch envelope. Open, it is a 21-inch-long satchel as roomy as a hammock. Called the "Bottomless Carry-All," this paragon of canvas, comes in several colors and leather trims. T. Anthony, $26.95.

One's après­rit of Punt e Mes. In fact, Locarno and Lugano first became fashionable as winter resorts, for even the January climate is gentle enough for magnolias, wisteria, wild akes and orange trees.

The two towns are quite dissimilar, rather like the two sisters in "Gigi": one a well-endowed countess, the other preferring the qualities of honorable refinement. Lugano has only a quarter the number of summer visitors, but by far the superior hotels (in the grill room of the Palma, you dine off gold plate). From here you may explore some of the prettiest and least exploited country in the whole of Switzerland, the country of the Centovalli or "Hundred Valleys" which lies between the lake and the Alps. An extraordinary little three-carriage electric train sets off from the city center like a tram, and runs on a single-line track through the back gardens of cottages, over spindly little bridges and past a succession of gorges and waterfalls, fat green fields, chestnut forests, vineyards and orchards.

Lugano, a little further south and east, presides over its lake like a baby Naples, the steep hillsides of Castagnola rising Vesuvius-like beside it. The lake steamers ply Italian as well as Swiss ports. You can make a brief crossing to the Italian enclave of Campione with its casino or to a superb outdoor restaurant, the Romantica at Melide. Even shorter trips, a morning and an afternoon apiece, take in two little villages close by Lu­gano: Gandria and Morcote. Gandria, which I remember from a previous visit, is a picturesque red-cooed village piled up on the northern shores of the lake.

The village consists of a long labyrinth of stone steps leading in every direction. One extended flight disclosed a pretty little church with charming roccoco frescoes. I found again the café I had remembered, where they serve local white wine in a jug from which you are also expected to drink. Nothing could be nicer than to lunch here on lake fish while sitting on a vine-shaded terrace overlooking the water.

Morcote, a village of subtro­pical vegetation on the tip of the peninsula that juts into the lake, was new to me. I arrived there at the unlikely hour of nine in the morning to see women already sluicing their doorsteps and setting out ceramics, rush baskets and copper kettles for the benefit of whatever tourists might pass by. I climbed a prodigious flight of steps through arbores of olive trees to see a church which I would now list as a doubtful objective, but the view was worth every uphill tread.

A Byzantine surprise

The treasure of this little town, for me at any rate, was the Rieder Museum. The listing in the local guide book: "Collections of Ikons" was my only clue. My interest increasing as I looked at the exhibits, I asked the sentry at the ticket booth who guided me around: Was M. Rieder still alive? He was. Then where did he live, and might it be possible to meet him? Finally the guide doffed his cloth cap, bowed slightly, and said: "C'est moi." He also admitted that he generally gave less than his best to English, American and his own fellow Swiss visitors, who considered peasants in the matter of Byzantine art. He told me how he had spent twenty years, pre-war, at the court of Queen Marie of Rumania, amassing this remarkable collection which now fills an enchanting fifteenth-century house and in­cluded furniture, silverware and wonderful Rumanian embroidery as well as ikons. It is a great labor of love and, to those interested, well worth the visit—not least for its unlikely setting and for the fount of information which M. Rieder may be persuaded to pour forth.

One other excursion from Lugano which I commend is to Baron Von Thyssen's Villa Favorita at Castagnola, which contains one of the greatest private collections of pictures in Europe. The villa is regularly open to the public only from March to October, and it would be wise to check locally for opening times.

As far as shopping in the Italian area of Switzerland is concerned, you would be well advised to cross the Italian border close by, especially since customs formalities for visitors are almost entirely relaxed. There are some excellent shops in Como, particular­ly for silks, leather products and casual resort clothes. The prices are way below those of Switzer­land, although not, of course, for watches, cameras and other pre­cision instruments. The best places to shop for these are in the tax­free stores of the Geneva or Zurich airports when you are leaving the country for home.

with me and still sat under my desk, but on a rug from Kairouan.
I went to receptions but, firmly, only those given to do honor to famous men of my profession. A considerable number passed through Rome. The years passed. The dog grew old and blind, and I grew careless of my resolves. I even went to a fashionable tailor.

Here I was surrounded by three master tailors and a special assistant was called whose only duty was to kneel in front of me and help me take off my trousers.

There were many fittings, and once when he did this, I noticed with acute embarrassment that, in a moment of abstraction, I had forgotten to put on my shorts. I apologized. I lied. I said that as I was dressing I had suddenly heard of the news of the death of Albert Camus. He had, indeed, died the night before, but I had never cared a jot for his works. The assembled tailors listened. Then the chief tailor said, in the tone of a priest giving absolution:

"It does not matter at all. Mr. Mel Ferrer was here before you. He never wears shorts."

So it was all right. I had no need for Camus. Mr. Ferrer had preceded me. Effortlessly, as though to the manner born, I had adopted the habits of the elite of the world.

The suit was beautiful. It led to invitations from wearers of equally beautiful suits. Nobody asked anymore how I was doing, because it was clear that I was doing all right. In the eyes of the world I had arrived.

Then one day, last summer, the dog who had been born in the house of the rich American retired to a corner of the house of a man with sixteen coat hangers and died. I buried her at midnight: my dog—and much else that I shall always miss.
